

BOYS, READ THE RADIO ARTICLES IN THIS NUMBER

No. 984

AUGUST 8, 1924

Price 8 Cents

FAME ^{AND} FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY.

CHASING POINTERS; OR, THE LUCKIEST BOY IN WALL STREET.

AND OTHER STORIES

By A SELF-MADE MAN.

The scream came from the office of Colt & Co. Fred flung open the door, and saw a man in a silk hat pressing his hand over Daisy's mouth, to stifle her cries. It was evident that there was foul play going on.

1960-1961
SEND YOUR WANT LIST.
RALPH P. SMITH
BOX 985
LAWRENCE, MASS.

BOOKS, MAGAZINES, NOVELS
Bought, Sold and Exchanged. Write for lists
Out of Print Five Cent Novels, Our Specialty
HAROLD G. LORANG, Darien Center, N. Y.

Are You A Radio Fan? Read Pages 24 and 25

FAKE AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

Issued weekly—Subscription price, $4.00 per year; Canada, $4.50; Foreign, $5.00. Harry E. Wolf, Publisher, Inc., 160 West 23d Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as Second-Class Matter October 4, 1911, at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879.

No. 984

NEW YORK, AUGUST 8, 1924

CHASING POINTERS

OR, THE LUCKIEST BOY IN WALL STREET

By A SELF-MADE MAN

CHAPTER I.—Honesty Is the Best Policy.

Two messenger boys, one tall and lanky, the other short and compact, popped out of one of the elevators when it came to a stop at the sixth floor of the Mills Building one morning at about ten o'clock, and made a simultaneous run down the empty corridor. The tall boy was known as Owen Murphy, the short lad as Fred Ticknor. Both were employed by neighboring brokers in a Wall Street office building—the former by Spencer & Sysonby, the latter by Colt & Co. Both boys saw a flat, dark-brown object lying in their path, and each, recognizing that it was a pocketbook, made a quick grab for it. Ticknor got it and straightened up with a triumphant grin.

"Halves!" demanded Murphy, with a greedy, disappointed look.

"Not on your life, Murphy," replied Fred. "It's not ours to divide. Somebody lost his wallet, and if I can find out who it belongs to I'm going to return it to him."

"How are you goin' to do it when you don't know who it belongs to?"

"Here's the owner's name—George Bates—stamped in gilt letters on the flap."

"S'pose it is? How are you goin' to find him?"

"I'll open it and see if I can find the owner's address," said Fred, suiting the action to the word, much to his companion's satisfaction.

"Not a cent," chuckled Murphy, as the main compartment of the wallet revealed merely a number of papers and newspaper clippings. "Did you ever get left in your life? Ho, ho, ho!"

As Fred opened up an inner pocket, however, there were displayed half a dozen $500 bills, together with the business card of a broker on that floor of the building.

"Did you ever get left yourself, Owen Murphy?" laughed Fred, as he exhibited the bills and took out the card.

Murphy stopped grinning and gazed hungrily at the money.

"Oh, come now, Fred Ticknor, you're not goin' to be such a chump as to hunt up the owner of that money," remonstrated Spencer & Sysonby's messenger. "There must be two or three thousand dollars there. Give me two of them bills and I'll never say a word about you findin' the wallet. All you've got to do is to take out them bills and throw the book just as it is down the first sewer hole you come to on your way back to your office."

"Say, Murphy, what do you take me for?" asked Fred, indignantly.

"I take you for a fool if you don't do as I say."

"Well, I'm not going to do as you say. Here's the card of a broker on his floor. I mean to get the address of Mr. George Bates from him or turn the wallet over to him to be return to its owner."

"Do you mean that?" asked Murphy, with a look of disgust.

"I do, and if you wait around here until I've delivered my message to Gage & Moran you'll see me do it," replied Fred, decidedly, closing the wallet and putting it into his pocket.

"You'll never get a chance like this again, Ticknor," said Murphy discontentedly. "A feller that'll let a streak of luck like this get away from him don't deserve nothin'. I don't wonder that you and your folks is hard up. You ought to be."

"Look here, Murphy, you ought to be ashamed of yourself to talk that way. You know that if I took this money, whether I divided it with you or not, it would be just the same as stealing it, when I've got a plain clue to find the owner."

"Oh, rats! A man that can afford to carry $500 bills around in his pocket can afford to lose 'em. We need 'em a blamed sight more than he does."

"You'd have kept the money, then, I suppose?" answered Fred.

"I'd kept one of the bills, at any rate, for my trouble in trying to find the owner. It's worth it."

"Run on and deliver your message," said Fred, abruptly. "I'm going in here."

He opened the outer door of Gage & Moran's office and admitted himself into the reception-room. The office boy, who knew him, said Mr. Gage was busy and couldn't be disturbed.

"Well, you can take this envelope in to him, can't you, and let me know whether there's any answer?"

"Sure I can," replied the boy. "Take a seat till I come back."

Fred Ticknor was the son of a poor widow. He had a twin sister named Bessie, who worked for Mandelbaum & Co., on the fourth floor of a big building on Broadway. The brother and sister supported their mother, who made their humble home a little haven of comfort for them. Mrs. Ticknor, who had been brought up in comfort and even luxury, had sacrificed her prospects and estranged herself from her family by marrying a poor but talented artist.

After a ten years' fight for recognition, her husband died suddenly on the eve of success, and since then the little widow had had a hard struggle to bring up her two children and make both ends meet. She managed to keep them at the public school until both graduated, and then Fred secured a position as a Wall Street messenger, while Bessie got work in a skirt factory, and their united wages made life somewhat easier for their mother.

There was no answer to the note Fred brought to Gage & Moran, so he walked down the corridor to Alfred Byron's office, which was the name on the card in the wallet. He asked for Mr. Byron and was admitted to the private office.

"Well," said the broker, wheeling around in his chair, what can I do for you?"

"Do you know a man by the name of George Bates?" asked Fred.

"I do."

"Did he call on you this morning?"

"He was here about half an hour ago. What is the purport of your questions, young man?" asked Mr. Byron, regarding his young visitor sharply.

"The fact of the matter is, I found——"

Here he was interrupted by the sudden and unannounced entrance of a tall, good-looking man of perhaps forty years of age, who seemed to be much excited.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Byron, but I have lost my pocketbook. I thought perhaps I dropped it in your private room when I took out my handkerchief."

"I have not seen it, Mr. Bates. You might look around on the carpet. By the way, here is a boy who has been inquiring about you."

"About me?" asked the visitor, regarding Fred inquiringly.

"Yes, sir, if your name is George Bates."

"That's my name."

"Then I guess this is your wallet, isn't it?" asked the boy, taking the article from his pocket.

"Why, yes," replied the gentleman, in an immensely relieved tone. "Where did you find it?"

"In the corridor not far from the elevators, about fifteen minutes ago."

"And you came in here to return it, did you?"

"Yes, sir. I opened it to see if I could find your address, and I discovered Mr. Byron's card. So I came in to find out if he knew you."

"I am very much obliged to you, my lad. You are an honest boy, evidently, for you could not help seeing that there were several five-hundred-dollar bills in the wallet."

"I saw them, sir."

"I'm afraid some boys would have appropriated the money and then destroyed the pocketbook and its contents. The papers in this wallet are worth a great deal more to me than the three thousand dollars. You have done me a valuable service, and it will give me a great deal of pleasure to present you with one of these five-hundred-dollar bills. You have fairly earned it," said Mr. Bates, holding the money out to him.

Fred looked at it with longing eyes, but made no effort to take it.

"I did not bring your wallet back in expectation of receiving a reward, sir," he said. "Of course, if you choose to give me something I shall accept it with thanks; but five hundred dollars—I have no right to take as much as that from you."

Mr. Bates seemed to be pleased with Fred's attitude in the matter.

"You seem to be an uncommon boy," he replied. "In my opinion you clearly deserve a reward commensurate with the value of the service you have rendered me. I beg you will accept the bill—I can easily afford to give it to you."

Fred took it with some hesitation.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir. Your liberality is unusual."

"I think the circumstances are sufficiently unusual to warrant it, my lad. What do you think, Mr. Byron?"

"I agree with you, Mr. Bates. I think you are uncommonly lucky to get your property back intact. I believe in encouraging honesty when you come across it, if only on account of its rarity under the fire of temptation."

"What is your name, my boy?" asked Mr. Bates.

"Fred Ticknor."

"You are employed in this neighborhood, I presume?"

"I am working as office boy and messenger for Colt & Co., stock brokers, No. — Wall Street."

"Well, I rather think I should like to keep track of a boy of your caliber. Here is my card. Call on me some time when you have leisure. I may be able to do something for you."

"Thank you, sir; I will."

"Well," he said to himself, as he walked along the corridor toward the elevators, "I think this is proof that honesty is the best policy, after all—at any rate, it's my policy, and I mean never to go back on it."

CHAPTER II.—The Unexpected Liberality of Mr. Colt.

"It took you a long time to deliver that note to Gage & Moran, Ticknor," said Mr. Colt, when Fred returned to the office and told his employer that he had brought back no answer. "Was there a fire in Broad Street? or perhaps you stopped to have a hair-cut and shampoo?" sarcastically.

"No, sir; nothing of that kind. I found a pocketbook in the Mills Building, and I lost a little time in handing it back to the owner."

"What was in the pocketbook?" asked Mr. Colt, sharply.

"There were some papers, sir, and three thousand dollars in bills."

"Three thousand dollars in bills?" gasped the broker, looking at his office boy as if he was a new species of animal. "And you returned that pocketbook to the owner?"

"I did. That was right, sir, wasn't it?"

"Of course it was right, but——" He stopped and looked hard at the boy. "Who was the man that lost it?" he asked suddenly.

"His name was George Bates. He gave me his card. Here it is."

"That's one of the biggest outside operators in the Street. Did he give you anything?"

"He gave me five hundred dollars, sir."

"Well, I'm glad to find I have such an honest boy in my employ," said Mr. Colt, sardonically.

"I thought you always considered me honest, sir," replied Fred, feeling a bit depressed by his employer's manner.

"Well, there are degrees of honesty, young man. I expected you were like the average run—that is, I never would have suspected you guilty of theft without some good evidence. But when a boy of your age finds a pocketbook with money in it the temptation is usually irresistible to keep it and say nothing about it."

"My mother taught me differently, sir. I don't think it pays to keep what doesn't belong to you unless you find it impossible to discover the owner."

"Humph! We won't discuss the matter. You are rather out of the ordinary. I think I will raise your wages two dollars a week on the strength of your being a kind of phenomenon," grunted Mr. Colt. "Take these papers to Miss Dean for her to copy. On the way you can hand that to the cashier."

"That" was an order to the cashier to raise Fred's wages from six dollars to eight dollars. Fred thanked him for the raise and left the private office.

"What's this?" asked the cashier, glancing over Mr. Colt's penciled memoranda. "A two-dollar raise, eh? Did you have the nerve to beard him in his den for that in the condition he is in this morning?" said the man in astonishment.

"I didn't ask him for it," replied Fred. "He handed it out voluntarily."

"He did!" almost gasped the cashier. "Well, I've been with him six years, and I never knew him to do that before."

"There's always a first time with everything," grinned Fred, passing on to the stenographer's room.

Miss Daisy Dean, who attended to Mr. Colt's correspondence and such other matters as he had to do, was not exclusively employed by him, though her office opened out of his counting-room. There was another door to her office opening on to the corridor, and the glass part of it bore the legend, "Miss Dean, Public Stenographer."

"I suppose I'm as welcome as the flowers in May," chuckled Fred, as he walked into Daisy's room, "for I've brought a batch of work for you."

"You're always welcome, Fred," replied the young lady, sweetly, "whether you bring work or not."

"You said that very nicely, Miss Dean," grinned the boy. "This seems to be my lucky day."

"Indeed! Have you been unusually fortunate to-day?"

"I have, for a fact."

"In what respect, if I am not asking too much?"

"You see, my luck began in the Mills Building, where I carried a note to the office of Gage & Moran."

Miss Dean looked interested.

"I hadn't more than stepped out of the elevator on the sixth floor when I ran against a pocketbook."

"You picked it up, I suppose?"

"Well, say, I'm not passing such things by."

"Was there any money in it?"

"Three thousand dollars."

"My goodness! And what did you do with it?"

"Returned it to the owner, and he presented me with five hundred dollars for my trouble."

"Is it possible! You were lucky."

"When I told Mr. Colt about finding and returning the wallet he was so surprised to think that any boy would return a pocketbook with money in it that he raised me two dollars on the spot. He almost took my breath away, but I had enough left to thank him for his munificence."

"Munificence is good, Fred. Been consulting a dictionary lately?" laughed Miss Dean.

"No, but I think the word applies to my case, for it was a big boost for Mr. Colt to indulge in, especially when you consider the grouch he had on this morning. When the clerks hear of it they'll have a fit."

Daisy laughed heartily at the comical way the young messenger put it, and then, one of her customers coming in at the moment, Fred left and returned to the counting-room, where he took his customary seat, ready to attend to callers or to go out on another errand, as the case might be.

"Well," said Murphy, suspiciously, when the boys met again that afternoon, "did you turn that pocketbook in to the owner, as you said you were going to do?"

"I did." And he told Murphy the circumstances, withholding the fact that he had received a five-hundred-dollar bill for his honesty, for he knew well enough the other would insist that he ought to divide the money between them, and he could not see what right Murphy had to any of it.

"What did he give you?"

"You mean the owner of the wallet?"

"That's who I mean."

"You'll have to ask him, for I'll never tell you."

"Why don't you?" demanded Murphy, aggressively.

"Because I'm not telling everything I know. It's poor policy."

Murphy turned his back on Fred and walked off.

CHAPTER III.—Fred's First Transaction On the Market.

Before Mr. Colt left for home that afternoon every clerk in the counting-room had heard about the messenger's boy's raise of wages.

"You're the luckiest boy in Wall Street," said Duncan, the margin clerk, to Fred, whom he had stopped on his way to the washroom.

"I was pretty lucky to-day, at any rate," replied the boy, with a grin.

At quarter past three he was off for the day, and before going home he asked the cashier to change his five-hundred-dollar bill for five one-hundred ones. He put four of the bills in an envelope, sealed it and put his name on it, then asked the cashier to keep it in the safe for him. The other hundred he put in his pocket to surprise his mother with.

"I made some extra money to-day, mother," he said, at the suppertable.

"How did you make it, Fred?" asked his sister.

Then he told the story of the finding and restoration of the pocketbook.

"And you actually received five hundred dollars?" said his sister, opening her eyes in astonishment.

"Yes, and here is one hundred of it, mother, which I make you a present of; the balance is in an envelope in the office safe."

He tossed his mother the bill.

"What, all this for me!" the little woman exclaimed, looking at the bill in a kind of wonder, for it had been many a long day since she had seen or handled a bill of so large a denomination.

"Sure it's for you. Who has a better right to it? You can buy yourself a new dress, and a new hat, and lots of other things that you need. Don't be stingy with yourself, mother, for there's more where that came from."

Next morning when Fred got to the office—which he always did ahead of the other employees—he sat down in his chair and began to read the previous day's quotations, together with other matters connected with the financial world. This morning he noticed a paragraph referring to the upward spurt of a stock called J. & D., which had advanced four points since the previous Monday. The paper said there was a rumor afloat that a syndicate had been formed to boom these shares, but it could not be verified. When Duncan, the margin clerk, came in, Fred asked him what he thought was the cause of the rise in J. & D. shares.

"I couldn't tell you," replied Duncan. "It may be a real boom, or it may only be a temporary boost that will peter out to-day, or to-morrow, or the next day. Only the persons on the inside have any accurate knowledge on the subject."

"The market is rather a dangerous thing for an outsider to monkey with, don't you think, Mr. Duncan?"

"Dangerous! It's as risky as handling a dynamite bomb. I usually advise friends of mine to keep out of it, unless they have a good pointer."

"A good pointer is hard to get, I guess."

"Well, rather. People are chasing them up and down Wall Street every day, but they're about as easy to lay hold of as a greased pig."

"Did you ever catch one?" grinned Fred.

"Several. I made a small wad on two of them, but the third pointed to the poorhouse, for I landed in the soup."

Duncan went to work, while Fred pondered over the truthfulness of his remarks. Later on he heard a couple of Mr. Colt's customers talking about the probability of a boom in J. & D.

By and by Fred was sent with a message to a broker at the Exchange, and while passing in at the New Street entrance he overheard a bunch of D. T. messengers talking about the same stock.

"A good many people seem to have J. & D. on their brain this morning," he mused. "I'd like to scoop in a real Simon-pure pointer on the subject, now that I have a few dollars in the office safe. I might be able to double my wad."

He looked at the tape when he got back to the office and found there had been quite a number of sales of J. & D. shares, and that it had gone up another point.

"It was 68 Saturday morning," he said to himself; "it is now 73. Somebody will make money out of it."

When he went on an errand shortly afterward he met a messenger he knew, and they stopped to have a chat.

"I wish I had a hundred cases," said his friend.

"What for?" asked Fred.

"I'd put it upon J. & D. shares."

"How do you know your tip is any good?"

"I heard my boss tell an old customer to buy J. & D. He said it was good for a ten-point rise. He wouldn't have told him that unless he was pretty certain of the matter. If I had a hundred dollars I'd risk it on the strength of that, and I'd be willing to bet fifty dollars more, if I had it, that I'd win a hundred dollars."

Fred, whose mind was now full of the prospects of J. & D., thought this pointer so good that he decided to take the risk of buying fifty shares. He got the envelope containing his money and, going around to a little bank in Nassau street that made a specialty of doing business on the market for small investors, put up three hundred and sixty-five dollars on a ten per cent. margin at the market price of 73. It was his first speculation, though he felt somewhat relieved when the market closed to find that J. & D. had advanced to 75. That evening he told his sister in the strictest confidence that he had risked the bulk of his four hundred dollars on fifty shares of J. & D. stock.

Next morning J. & D. shares were in greater demand than at any time since the boom started, and by noon the stock had advanced to 78. Fred was waiting for an answer to a note in a Broadway office when he saw this quotation on the ticker, and it made him feel good.

"I guess it will go to 80, all right," he said to himself. "White's pointer was a pretty good one."

Fred was fully determined to sell out when J. & D. reached 80, but he was kept so busy running errands that afternoon he found no opportunity to get around to the little Nassau street bank, and so the Exchange closed with the shares at 85 5-8 before he realized that business was over for the day.

It was eleven o'clock the next day before Fred got the chance to run around to the bank to order the stock sold, and in the meantime there had been a good deal of business done in the shares and the price had gone up to 85 3-8, and that was the figure the boy realized. When he got his check and statement on the following day he found his profit amounted to a little over six hundred dollars.

"Gee whiz!" he exclaimed. "I'm actually worth a thousand dollars."

CHAPTER IV.—Murphy Finds a Hundred-Dollar Bill, and What Comes of It.

Before three o'clock that day Fred managed to get around to the bank in Nassau street.

"I got this check of yours through the mail this morning," he said to the cashier. "I want to know if you will cash it and keep most of it here for me until I want to draw it out?"

"Are you Fred Ticknor?"

"Yes sir."

"You'll have to get some one we know to identify you."

"Your margin clerk ought to remember I bought fifty shares of J. & D. from him a few days ago, and that I came in here yesterday about eleven o'clock and ordered the shares sold. Here is your statement of the transaction."

"Well, step around with me to his desk, and if he will identify you I'll fix the matter up?"

The margin clerk recognized Fred as the party to the deal and the cashier was astisfied.

"As you are a minor we can't open an account with you, Ticknor," said the gentleman, "but I can give you a certificate of deposit for whatever money you leave with us."

"That will answer," replied Fred. "Give me two hundred dollars cash and a certificate for the rest."

The mater was so arranged. Owen Murphy had been as good as his word and had not noticed Fred since the afternoon our hero had refused to tell him what he got for returning the wallet to Mr. Bates, or ante up even a five-dollar bill. Fred did not suffer any from the loss of Murphy's society, as he never liked him much. For two weeks the boys frequently passed each other in the corridor of the office building without any sign of recognition. But one morning Fred was surprised to receive a triumphant wink from Murphy as they came together in the elevator. He looked at his former acquaintance narrowly, without saying a word. They both stepped out of the elevator together, and then Murphy could hold in no longer.

"Look here, Fred," he said, "I want to tell you somethin'."

"Well, what is it? Got over your grouch?"

"Never mind that. I found somethin' myself yesterday," he said, in a mysterious way.

"Another pocketbook?" grinned Fred.

"Nope. A hundred-dollar bill."

"Where did you find it?"

"That's tellin's," grinned Murphy.

"What did you stop me for?"

"I wanted to let you know that you ain't the only pebble at findin' things," replied Murphy, with a look of intense satisfaction.

"Oh, I see. Thought maybe you'd make me feel bad, eh? Well, the fact that you found a hundred dollars, or even a thousand dollars, wouldn't worry me in the least."

"Oh, I just wanted you to know—that's all. P'raps you think I'm kiddin' you? Well here's the bill," and he took it out of his vest pocket and showed it to Fred.

It was a brand-new bill issued by the National City Bank, and on the back of it was stamped in pencil the name and business address of somebody who had the bill in his possession.

"Going to try and find the owner?" asked Fred.

"What do you take me for? A chump?"

"That might represent a serious loss to somebody."

"That isn't my business. I'm going to have a swell time out of this bill. I'll treat you to a show to-night if you'll come with me."

"Thanks," replied Fred; "but I've got an engagement."

Murphy look disappointed, and soon afterward the boys separated. They met, however, again at a quick-lunch counter, and Murphy renewed to take Fred to a show, but without result. They both stepped to the cashier's desk together, and Murphy, pushing Fred's fifteen cents back, told the proprietor to take the price of the two lunches out of the one-hundred-dollar bill.

The man looked at the bill and then at Murphy.

"Where did you get this?" he asked suspiciously.

"What's the matter with it?" asked Murphy, with an anxious look. "Isn't it good?"

"It's good enough, but it's a large bill for a boy to have around loose. Haven't you any smaller change?"

"I want to change that bill."

"I wouldn't mind changing it if I thought you came honestly by the bill."

"Do you think I'm a thief?" demanded Murphy indignantly.

"My name is Owen Murphy, and I work for Spencer & Sysonby. Ask him if I ain't all right," and he pointed to Fred.

A line of impatient people was beginning to collect near the cash desk, so the proprietor refused to change the bill, and Murphy grumblingly paid in small change for his own lunch, as Fred insisted on settling his own check.

The bill, however, was destined to get Murphy into trouble. The broker who had lost the bill advertised for it on the chance that it might have fallen into the hands of an honest person.

Fred saw the advertisement and called Murphy's attention to it.

"That's ain't the bill I found," said Murphy, with a red face.

Fred let the matter drop, as he didn't care to expose Murphy. Another man who had received the bill in payment for a debt noticed the advertisement and communicated with the loser. An investigation followed and the money was traced back to Murphy. Spencer & Sysonby's messenger, finding himself cornered, admitted the fact, and said he had found the bill in the Barnum Building.

The broker said he had lost the money there, and demanded its return, less the twenty-five dollars he had offered as reward. As he had clearly identified his property, the saloon-keeper who changed it sent for Murphy, gave him the bill and got one hundred dollars back. The bill was then given to its rightful owner, who paid Murphy the twenty-five dollars reward. Murphy then paid the saloon-keeper the twenty-five dollars to settle the amount of his original debt.

CHAPTER V.—How Fred Gets His Second Pointer.

Fred told Daisy Dean about his good luck with the J. & D. shares, and she congratulated him on his success, but at the same time warned him against putting too much faith in the market.

Among others, Miss Dean did work occasionally for a broker named Barclay Calcutt, who had an office on the floor above. He was a tall, good-looking man, with a heavy black mustache, who dressed as swell as any man on the Street, but for all that the pretty stenographer didn't like him much. As long as he brought her work and paid for it on delivery she was satisfied to have him for a customer; but after a while he would find some excuse for lingering in her den, which interfered somewhat with her work, and then the young lady began to find him a rather undesirable patron. The fact of the matter was that Barclay Calcutt was smitten with the young lady's many charms, and he was trying to make himself solid with her. He brought her a lot of typewriting that he had no use for simply to get a chance to have a talk with her, and finally one day he asked her if she had any money for which she had no immediate use.

Daisy thought this a pretty cheeky question on his part, but before she could make a non-committal reply he went on to say that he had come down expressly to give her a tip on the market, if she could make any use of it.

"I have made it a rule never to risk any money in stocks," replied Daisy, hoping he would take himself off.

"But this is a sure thing, Miss Dean. I have it on the best of authority that a pool of big operators has been formed to boom L. & S. shares, which are now ruling at 89. I assure you, Miss Dean, they will surely go to 110, and perhaps higher. I am giving you this pointer because I have an eye to your interest, and it would give me great pleasure to put you in the way of making some extra money."

Mr. Calcutt tried to make it apparent that his motive was one of particular friendship for Miss Dean, and that she was the only one he would give such a tip to. Daisy thanked him and said she would think the matter over. Daisy was glad when he took his departure, for she felt greatly embarrassed because he insisted on putting her under obligations to him, as it were. She tried to think of some excuse for declining any further work from Mr. Calcutt, thereby depriving him of any pretext for forcing his presence upon her in the future.

While she was figuring out the matter, Fred entered with a batch of work from Mr. Colt, and, knowing that the young messenger was a friend on whom she could thoroughly depend, she laid the whole trouble before him and asked his advice.

"He told me that he knew positively that a pool of big operators had been formed to boom L. & S., and that the stock would surely go up in a few days."

"Did he tell you how he got his information?"

"He did not."

"He expected you to accept his word. Well, considering the interest he appears to take in you, I guess he wouldn't be likely to hand you out anything that wasn't the real thing, for if you invested any money on the strength of what he told you, and the deal went wrong, it would only queer him with you for good and all."

"But I don't want his tip, and I wish he hadn't given it to me," replied the girl, in a troubled tone. "If the pointer is really all that he claims for it, he will feel that he has put me under obligations to him, and will take advantage of the fact to annoy me with his unwelcome attentions."

"If he's a gentleman he'll leave you alone when he sees he isn't welcome here; if he persists in bothering you, then he's no gentleman and ought to be shown it."

Daisy finally decided that she would tell Mr. Calcutt that she was too busy to do any more work for him, and see what effect that would have on the situation. Next morning Fred kept track of L. & S., and he noticed that twenty thousand shares were traded in by noon, at prices ranging from 89 to 90.

"That looks like business," he said to himself. "I guess I'll buy fifty shares, at any rate."

So he went around to the bank in Nassau street and drew four hundred and fifty dollars against his certificate of deposit, and handed the cash to the margin clerk, with an order to buy fifty shares of L. & S. at 90 on margin.

By the time Fred got back to his office the shares were bought and held by the bank subject to his order. At three o'clock, when the Exchange closed, L. & S. was ruling at 92. During the next two days the shares fluctuated between 90 and 94, closing on Saturday noon at the latter figure. That morning Daisy told Fred that Mr. Calcutt had called with some new work, but she had refused to accept it on the plea that she was too busy.

"What did he say?" asked the boy.

"He insisted on leaving it, saying he was in no hurry and that I could do it when I would find time. He also asked me if I had taken advantage of his pointer. When I said I had not, he seemed disappointed, and advised me to do so before it was too late to reap any benefit from it."

"Well, if you've got any money to spare I'd advise you to buy a few shares with me. I bought fifty the other day at 90; the last quotation this morning was 4. If I had money enough I'd buy fifty more at as near 94 Monday morning as I could get them. I'm satisfied the stock will go to par."

"Mr. Calcutt told me it would go to 110, and perhaps higher."

"Well, don't say another word, but come in with me on another fifty. I'll take thirty and you twenty. It'll cost you one hundred and eighty-eight dollars. Can you raise that much?"

"Yes. I'll bring it with me Monday."

"All right. I'm glad to have you for a partner in this deal," said Fred, as Daisy covered up her machine, preparatory to starting for home.

CHAPTER VI.—In the Nick of Time.

On Monday morning Miss Dean brought down enough money to make good the margin on 20 shares of L. & S. at 90.

Fred took it around to the bank in Nassau street, where he had more than enough to secure 30 additional shares of the stock. He bought the 50 shares in his own name. L. & S. gradually advanced to 96, and at intervals, when he happened to be in the office, Fred carried the good news to Daisy. Next day the excitement was more pronounced, and when L. & S. touched 102 the brokers began tumbling over one another in their efforts to get the stock.

The general public came rushing into the Street to invest, and Mr. Colt having his share of the business, Fred was kept unusually busy carrying notes here, there and everywhere during business hours. Next morning L. & S. opened at 112, and Fred told Daisy that he wasn't going to take any more chances. He carried out his intentions at once to sell, and within half an hour he and Miss Dean had no further personal interest in the doings of the market. When he got back to his chair in the office he occupied the few minutes of leisure he had in figuring up how much he and the stenographer had made out of the deal. The ticker showed a sale of one hundred shares at 112 5-8, and he judged that was the figure their holdings had gone at.

"On my fifty shares that I bought at 90 I make about eleven hundred dollars; on the thirty for which I gave 94 my profit is something like five hundred and fifty dollars. That's a total of sixteen hundred and fifty dollars. That isn't so bad on a capital of eight hundred dollars. Miss Dean has collared three hundred and seventy-five dollars. Nothing like having a first-class pointer to operate with."

Fred walked into the stenographer's den and showed the results of his calculation, which were verified next morning when he got a statement of account and a check from the bank.

"If mother knew I was worth twenty-four hundred and fifty dollars she'd fall off her chair from astonishment," said Fred, with a chuckle, to Daisy.

"Aren't you going to tell her?" the girl asked him.

"Not yet a while. I shall tell my sister, however. When I go to lunch I'll get your money, and you can take it home with you. I suppose you'll be buying some swell clothes on the strength of it."

"What makes you think so?" laughed Daisy.

"That's the first thing the girls think of when they have a wad in their pocketbook."

"You seem to know all about it, Fred," replied the pretty stenographer.

"Sure I do," he chuckled. "Gee! There goes my bell. I must leave you."

Fred drew one hundred and fifty dollars that afternoon, leaving the balance on a new certificate of deposit, and took the bills home to his mother.

"What, more money for me!" exclaimed the little mother as her son tossed her the bills across the supper-table. "You must have found another pocketbook."

"No, mother, but I made a little deal in stocks with the funds I had and came out a few hundred ahead. You heard me say the market has been booming lately. I got out just in time, for things went to pieces to-day, and a good many people have come out at the small end of the horn."

"I am glad to know that you are one of the fortunate ones," smiled his mother.

"Yes, I'm about the luckiest boy in Wall Street. There are very few messengers who have a bank account like me."

Next day Barclay Calcutt met Daisy Dean in the corridor. He and some equally lucky friends had been treating themselves to an unlimited number of mint juleps, and as a consequence Mr. Calcutt's face was flushed, his breath had a strong aroma of the cafe, and his limbs were not as steady as usual. He stepped the young lady as she was about to enter her office and asked her how much she had made out of his tip.

"I'm very busy, Mr. Calcutt," she answered, quite embarrassed. "Please permit me to pass."

At that moment Fred entered from the counting-room and told Daisy that Mr. Colt wanted her in his office. She grabbed her notebook and flew, leaving Barclay Calcutt and the boy together.

"Well, sir," said Fred, "what can I do for you?"

The broker looked at him in a fishy way, for he was several degrees more unsteady than when he entered the room.

"You can get out," he said thickly. "No use for you at all. Understand?"

Fred walked over and threw open the door.

"Miss Dean is very busy to-day, Mr. Calcutt. She can't be bothered with visitors. You will oblige her very much by leaving."

Fortunately for the boy, Barclay Calcutt's thoughts were diverted suddenly when he saw a friend out in the corridor, and he started for the door without another word. As soon as he was outside Fred shut the door after him and returned to the reception-room. When Daisy came out of Mr. Colt's private office he told her how he had managed to get rid of Barclay Calcutt.

"I'm ever so much obliged to you, Fred," she replied gratefully. "He seems to be intoxicated, and his conversation embarrassed me very much. I hope he won't come back."

Daisy had such a stack of work on hand that she decided to stay in her office until six o'clock. It was half-past three when Fred got back, and he was preparing to go home, when Mr. Colt called him into his sanctum and told him he wanted him to go to Brooklyn.

"I want you to take this letter to the residence of Mr. John Lynch, on President street, and bring me back an answer. If you are detained, and I am not here when you get back, you must bring the reply to my house."

"If Mr. Lynch is not at home shall I wait for him, sir?"

"You had better wait a reasonable time, and in case you leave without seeing him, and I am not here, call me up on the 'phone."

"All right, sir," replied the boy, starting off.

When Fred reached the residence of Mr. Lynch he found the gentleman had not got home. He waited half an hour and then started back for the office. It wanted a quarter to six when he reached the office building and walked up to the second floor. As Fred approached the door of his office the superintendent of the building came along and the boy nodded to him.

At that moment the shrill cry of a woman echoed through the corridor and startled both Fred and the superintendent. The scream came from the office of Colt & Co. Fred flung open the door and saw a man in a silk hat pressing his hand over Daisy's mouth. It was evident there was foul play going on.

CHAPTER VII.—Another Lucky Deal.

With the superintendent at his back, Fred Ticknor entered the reception-room, where the pretty stenographer was struggling with her assailant. Fred sprang at the man like a young tiger, and then it was that he caught his first glimpse of his face. It was Barclay Calcutt. His eyes were bloodshot and glaring, and he was evidently in a very ugly mood. The moment Fred seized him he released Daisy and turned his attention to the boy, whom he caught by the throat, and, forcing him back against the ticker, seemed bent on choking the life out of him. The superintendent had all he could do to drag the infuriated broker away from his victim.

"For heaven's sake, Mr. Calcutt," he said, "are you aware what you are doing?"

The broker glared at him for a moment and then seemed to recollect his position. The broker appeared to realize that he had placed himself in a bad hole, and the only excuse he could think of was that he was drunk and didn't know what he was doing.

If Mr. Calcutt was drunk, it was a different kind of intoxication to what he had been laboring under a few hours previous. Daisy Dean was almost prostrated by the assault made upon her by the broker, and could hardly make any statement of the circumstances when asked by Fred to do so.

Please take him away. I don't want to see him any more," she cried hysterically.

Fred led Daisy back to her office and tried his best to calm her. It was some time before she regained control over herself. Then she told him what had happened.

"Soon after the clerks left, and I was all alone, in this part of the office, somebody came to the corridor door, which I had locked, and tried it. I thought it was the janitor and paid no attention. I was not working on my machine at the time, but reading over my work preparatory to going away. At last I got through with what I had to do, and went to wash my hands and tidy my hair. As I was on the way back to my room I heard a noise in the outer office. I stopped and listened. I heard a drawer pulled out, and that excited my suspicions, so I stepped into the room and saw a man in a silk hat, whose back was toward me, standing alongside the filing cabinet, apparently examining the documents in one of the upper boxes. He had no right to be there, of course, and without thinking of any danger to myself I walked right up to him and asked his business. He turned around with a start, and then, to my astonishment, I recognized Mr. Calcutt. For a moment we stood and looked at each other, then he turned upon me with something that sounded like an oath and caught me by the arms. I was so startled that I screamed out. That enraged him and he pressed his hand over my mouth to prevent me from uttering another sound. What he intended to do at the cabinet I cannot guess, but he looked wicked enough to kill me, and, terribly frightened, I struggled to get away from him. It was then you came into the office and saved me. Oh, Fred, I am so thankful you were at hand to interfere at such a critical moment."

"I am mighty glad myself that I reached the office at a moment when my presence was needed."

"What brought you back at this late hour?"

Fred told her about his errand to Brooklyn.

"I waited a reasonable time for Mr. Lynch to show up, and as he did not do so I came back here to telephone the fact to Mr. Colt, according to his directions. I must do so now, and then I'll walk with you as far as the underground station."

Daisy put on her hat and wrap while Fred was in the booth, and was ready to go when he came out.

"I wonder what could have been Mr. Calcutt's object in entering our office and monkeying with the papers in the cabinet?" said Fred, as they walked out into the outer office. "He will have to explain his actions to Mr. Colt to-morrow, I fancy."

"I haven't the least idea what he was up to," Daisy answered.

"I dare say he'll claim he had a jag on and didn't know what he was doing; but from the way he acted I think he knew what he was about all right."

"But how could he have got into the office, Fred? The door ought to have been locked."

"Either it was not locked, through some oversight, or Mr. Calcutt had a key that fitted the lock."

"You think, then, that Mr. Calcutt deliberately came in here for some bad purpose? It seems incredible that a prosperous broker like him would do such a thing."

"How do you know he's prosperous?" asked Fred.

He told me this afternoon that he had made a barrel of money out of L. & S."

"That sounds reasonable, I'll admit, as he must have worked the tip he gave you, and we have good evidence it was a corker. Well, it doesn't make any difference how prosperous he is, his presence in this office under the circumstances in which you detected him looks pretty bad. I'll bet he's trying to work some scheme against Mr. Colt, and it will be up to the boss to-morrow to sift the matter for himself."

"Did you say anything to him over the wire?"

"No. I thought it best for you to explain matters in the morning. I'll give him the facts of the case as far as I know them, and the superintendent will corroborate me. He will then call you into the office, and you can tell your story."

Fred left Daisy at the station at the corner of Broadway and walked to his home in Cannon Street. Mr. Colt was both angry and mystified over Mr. Calcutt's conduct when he heard the news the next morning, and went upstairs to demand an explanation of that gentleman. How Calcutt squared himself neither Fred nor Daisy ever learned, but he ceased to bring the stenographer any more work, or to notice her when he passed her after that, which was a great satisfaction to the young lady.

About a week later Fred carried a note to Gage & Moran's office in the Mills Building. He had to wait for some paper to be prepared for him to take back, and while sitting near the ticker two well-known brokers came in and asked to see Mr. Moran. The office boy took their names into the private office, and while waiting for him to return the visitor began talking about a deal that was forming to control D. & G. shares. They stood so close to Fred that the boy could not very well help hearing all they said.

He did not know much about the stock that formed the subject of their conversation, but he did know the brokers well by sight and reputation. Fred knew there must be something in this thing, or they would not be so interested in the matter. He wondered how he could find out something more about it. There was nobody he dared question on the subject, so he began to watch the newspapers, thinking some hint about the deal might get into print. He also looked up the recent record of D. & G. and compared prices for weeks back, with the result that he found the stock was selling below its normal figure.

"I don't think D. & G. will go any lower than it is now under present conditions. In fact, it should go up two or three points before long, without reference to any deal that may be going on behind the curtain. I think I'll buy three shares, anyway, at the present price, 65, and if my pointer amounts to anything I'll make a good thing out of it. If it doesn't pan out I ought to make something, anyway, for the market seems ripe for some kind of an advance."

So next day Fred put up nineteen hundred and fifty dollars of his money as margin on three hundred shares, hoping his former luck would continue. He was not disappointed, for a very rapid rise followed his purchase. In two days D. & G. was in great demand at 71, and it kept right on upward. Then Fred told Daisy about his new venture. Instead of scolding him, as he had half expected she would, she asked him if he would buy fifty shares for her at the market price. He said he would, and the next morning she brought enough money down to secure the shares at 72, the price he had to pay for them. Next day the stock boomed to 78, and Fred and Daisy shook hands with each other.

That afternoon D. & G. closed at 81, and small outside speculators were bringing their little wads into the Street to go long on the shares. Next morning about eleven o'clock Fred overheard two brokers say that they guessed D. & G. was getting topheavy, and that they looked to see it drop back into the lower seventies as soon as the bears got their work in. Fred knew that these two brokers were considered men of sound judgment, so he decided that it was dangerous for him to take any further chances with the stock. It was then ruling at 87, with every apparent chance of going higher.

"Enough is as good as a feast," he said to himself, starting for the bank in Nassau Street, "though, on the whole, a profit of twenty-five dollars a share isn't a bad banquet when you come to figure on it."

He ordered his shares and Daisy's to be closed out at once, and it was done inside of ten minutes. When he got back to the office he reported the close of the deal to Miss Dean.

"I'll clear something over seven hundred dollars, won't I?" she said joyfully.

"That's what you will."

"And how much are you ahead?—You bought at 65, I think?"

"I am sixty-five hundred dollars to the good. Think of that for a messenger boy! Am I lucky or not?"

"You're the luckiest boy in Wall Street," she said.

CHAPTER VIII.—Laying a Trap.

Fred had kept his latest speculative venture a secret from his sister. He wanted to give her a good, big surprise in case he was as fortunate as he hoped to be. So when he went home that night he sprang it on her.

"You didn't know that I took another shy at the market about ten days ago, did you, Bess?" he grinned.

"Why, no; you never told me a word about it. Aren't you mean?"

"How much do you think I made this time?"

"How should I be able to guess! How much?"

"Sixty-five hundred dollars."

"Fred Ticknor, you don't mean that!" she exclaimed incredulously.

"I certainly do mean it. You remember, I've been carrying a certificate of deposit on that little Nassau Street bank for twenty-three hundred dollars around with me for some weeks, don't you?"

"Oh, yes."

"Ten days ago I heard a couple of brokers speaking about some deal that was under way in D. & G. stock. Well, I bought three hundred shares on the chance that there was something good at the bottom of their talk. I bought at 65 and this morning I sold at 87. Profit, sixty-five hundred dollars. There you have it in a nutshell."

"My goodness! It sounds too good to be true."

"Well, I can guarantee it's true. I'll show you a certificate of deposit to-morrow night for eighty-eight hundred dollars."

"Wall Street seems to be a regular gold mine for you, Fred."

"That's because luck and me are pulling together in the same boat."

"You ought to give mother some of that money."

"I'm going to. I'll give her seven hundred dollars and you one hundred dollars, and I'll treat you both to a bang-up dinner and the theater afterward."

"Aren't you just the best brother in the world!" exclaimed Bessie, running to Fred and giving him a big hug and a kiss.

Mrs. Ticknor could hardly believe the evidence of her eyes when Fred handed out the seven hundred dollars next evening, and told her it was part of a haul he had just made in the stock market.

"I think we ought to move uptown, mother, into a better neighborhood. We can afford to do that now, since fortune has begun to smile on us. I know flat hunting isn't a pleasant pastime, but people have to tackle it once in a while."

"Where would you like to go, my son?"

Fred mentioned several localities where he thought a cozy five-room flat could be found.

They had been living in three very inferior rooms for several years, and a change for the better was much to be desired. So in a day or two Mrs. Ticknor started uptown to select a nice flat of five rooms at a reasonable rent. She picked out several and left the final selection to her son. He and Bessie visited them on the following Sunday and deciding on one paid a deposit to secure it. A week later they were settled in their new home, and were quite delighted with it.

The clerks in Mr. Colt's office had noticed that Fred was pretty solid with the stenographer, and sometimes they jollied him about the intimacy. One of the bookkeepers, who was something of a dude in his attire, was smitten on the young lady and had made many several ineffectual attempts to attract her notice to himself. He was much put out because she treated Fred, who was only the office boy, in such a friendly way, while she practically ignored a person of such superior consequences as himself. He lost no opportunity to pass remarks reflecting on Fred's attentions to Miss Dean and frequently geyed the boy unmercifully. Fred stood it without saying a word.

He judged if he called the clerk down it would lead to a row with the fellow, and he thought the easiest way was the best out of the difficulty. One morning James Elder, that was the name of this particular clerk, bought a bunch of violets from an Italian sidewalk vender. He placed it in his desk until he had occasion to take a statement inside to Daisy to copy on her typewriter for him, then he carried the nosegay with him and presented it to her with one of his best bows and prettiest speeches.

She accepted it with a smile, and Elder, thinking that at last he had produced an impression on the charming girl, returned to his desk feeling like a bird. After a time Fred had occasion to bring some work to her, whereupon she took the violets off her desk and pinned them on the lapel of his jacket. One of the junior clerks noticed the flowers and asked Fred why he didn't present them to Miss Dean.

"Why, she just gave them to me herself."

Another clerk, who had seen Elder carry the self-same flowers in to the stenographer, laughed and called the bookkeeper's attention to Fred.

"He's wearing those violets you presented to Miss Dean. I guess you aren't in it with our office boy."

Elder, recognizing his floral offering, was so incensed that he rushed up to Fred, tore the violets from his buttonhole, and threw them into the waste basket.

"What did you do that for?" asked the boy, indignantly.

"None of your business, you little monkey," he answered in a rage, walking back to his desk.

"Well, if I was half the monkey you are I'd hire myself out to a dime museum," replied Fred.

"What's that?" cried Elder. "How dare you address such a remark to me, you impertinent whipper-snapper?"

"Thanks. You're a gentleman, I don't think," answered Fred, sarcastically.

"I shall report your insolence to Mr. Colt," said the clerk, loftily.

"I would if I was you," retorted the boy. "Then maybe you'll get what's coming to you."

Later on Elder did report Fred to Mr. Colt and the boss called his messenger inside and asked him what was the trouble between him and the bookkeeper. Fred explained how Elder had treated the bunch of violets Miss Dean had given him, and had called him a little monkey on top of it.

"If it hadn't been that I didn't want to raise a ruction in the office, I'd have pummeled him in the eye. The trouble with him is he'd dead gone on Miss Dean. She has no use for him, and he's sore on me because she treats me as a friend."

"All right," replied Mr. Colt; "but don't let me hear of any trouble between you and Elder inside my office."

"It won't be my fault if there is any, sir," said Fred. "I shall keep away from him as much as possible; but just the same I'm not going to let him walk roughshod over me, because he's a clerk and I'm only an office boy."

"Well, I won't have any scrapping in my office, Ticknor—understand that," said the broker, turning to his desk.

Elder was out of humor all day, for the other clerks roasted him in a quiet way about the violets he had bought expressly for Miss Dean, and which she in turn had presented to Fred. He concentrated his resentment on the young messenger, who had been the involuntary cause of his take-down, and determined to get square with him. If he could manage somehow to get the boy discharged, and thus separate him from the stenographer for good, he thought he would then have a clear field to himself.

A few days later, while Fred was out on an errand, a man who owed Mr. Colt ten dollars came into the office and handed him a bill in payment of his debt. The bill in question was noticeable from the fact that it had a red Maltese cross stamped on its back, and the broker saw it when his visitor placed the money on his desk alongside two letters that were waiting to be delivered. Mr. Colt accompanied his caller into the corridor, leaving the bill where the man had placed it.

Just as the man took his departure Mr. Spencer, of Spencer & Sysonby, whose offices were opposite, came up the stairs and seeing Mr. Colt asked him to step into his office with him. As the door closed behind them, Fred came dashing upstairs, and ran into his own office. He walked into his employer's private room, for he had brought back an answer to a note he had just carried over to Gage & Moran. He saw the two letters and the ten-dollar bill on Mr. Colt's desk as he placed the envelope down near them. Observing his employer's hat on the top of the desk he judged he had gone back to the counting-room, and he went to the window to wait for him to come back.

At that moment Daisy entered the private office, and went to a small filing cabinet that stood on a shelf alongside Mr. Colt's safe, which partially hid her presence in the room. A minute or two later James Elder entered the boss's sanctum, with a paper in his hand which he laid upon the desk. He, too, saw the ten-dollar bill and he also saw Fred looking out of the window.

Immediately an idea occurred to his mind and a sardonic smile curled his thin lips. He picked up the bill, folded it, and slyly approaching the boy, who was watching an altercation between a policeman and an Italian image vender, cautiously slipped it into his jacket pocket. Then with a grin of satisfaction he returned to the desk, took up the paper he had brought and softly left the room, going to one of the reception-room windows to look out himself, but keeping well on the alert.

Presently Fred left the private room and went back to the washroom just as Mr. Colt entered the office. Elder saw the broker come in, followed him into the private room and handed him the paper he had previously laid on the desk. Then he retired with a cheerful grin on his countenance, for he thought he had fixed the office boy.

"The boss saw him come out of his room," he chuckled. "If he will only search him when he misses that bill we'll have a new office boy next week."

The unprincipled clerk grinned and rubbed his hands one over the other in glee at the unhappy prospect that faced the young messenger whom he so cordially hated.

CHAPTER IX.—The Game that Didn't Work.

When Mr. Colt sat down at the desk he recollected the ten-dollar bill and reached for it, but it wasn't there. He looked the desk over, felt in his pockets, glanced about on the carpet and finally rang for Fred. The boy answered the summons.

"You were in here a moment ago, were you not, Ticknor?" he asked, watching the lad closely.

"Yes, sir; I brought that yellow envelope from Mr. Moran and put it on your desk."

"Did you see a ten-dollar bill near those two letters?"

"Yes, sir."

"You didn't pick it up by mistake, did you?"

"Why, no sir," answered the boy in surprise.

"Hum!" said his employer. "Was there any one else in here beside you at the time?"

"I didn't see any one. I was looking out of the window until the moment I left the room."

"Well, Ticknor, that bill seems to have vanished in a most mysterious way," said Mr. Colt. "You say you saw it when you left the room?"

"I saw it when I entered the room, sir."

"It's all the same, since no one else has been here. I saw you leave the room myself. I went directly to the desk and found the bill missing."

"I hope you don't suspect me to taking it, sir?" cried Fred.

"Well, it's very singular where it could have vanished to, Ticknor. You haven't any suggestion to offer, have you?"

"No, sir; it was lying right here," replied the boy, much disturbed.

"I know it was; but it isn't there now, is it?"

"No, sir."

At that moment Daisy came forward.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Colt, but I think I can tell you something about that bill," she said.

"I wish you would, if you know. I wasn't aware you were in the room."

"I've been here about ten minutes, sir, and I saw that bill leave your desk."

"Where did it go?" asked Mr. Colt, in some wonder.

"At this moment it happens to be in Fred's right-hand jacket pocket."

"What!" gasped the boy, with a look of reproach at the pretty stenographer.

Fred was standing close to the desk, so Mr. Colt reached over, put his hand into the pocket in question and drew out the bill with the Maltese cross on it.

"Hum!" he said, severely. "This looks bad for you, young man."

"My gracious! How could it have got into my pocket?" exclaimed the thunderstruck messenger in great dismay.

"There seems to be only one way it could have got there—you must have put it there in a fit of absent-mindedness."

"Never, sir!" answered Fred, earnestly.

"Hum!" replied the broker, incredulously.

"I can explain how it got there," said Daisy.

"I saw the whole thing."

"Then you saw Ticknor take it, eh?"

"No, sir. Fred was standing by the window looking out into the street at the time. Mr. Elder came in here with a paper in his hand which he placed on your desk. He started back, picked that bill up, folded it, walked over and dropped it into Fred's pocket, and left the room. He had no idea I was in here watching his actions. I think, sir it was a contemptible trick to get Fred into trouble. If you will call Mr. Elder in here, I will repeat my statement before his face, and dare him to deny its truth."

Both Mr. Colt and Fred were astonished at the turn the case had taken.

"This is a very serious charge you are making against Mr. Elder, Miss Dean," said the broker, regarding the stenographer attentively.

"I am not responsible for that gentleman's actions," she said, firmly. "If he chose to lower himself by committing such an unworthy deed it is my place at least, as a witness of the occurrence, to see that justice is done the innocent."

"Hum!" said the broker. "Ticknor, will you tell Mr. Elder that I wish to see him."

Fred walked into the counting-room and up to the bookkeeper's desk. There was blood in his eye, but he controlled himself as well as he could.

It would have given him a heap of satisfaction to have called the man a contemptible cur, and have smashed him in the face.

"Never mind," he breathed. "it'll keep."

Then out aloud he said: "Mr. Colt wishes to see you."

Turning his back on the man, he returned to the private office, followed by the bookkeeper, with a pen behind each ear.

"Mr. Elder, were you in my office while I was out?" asked Mr. Colt, when the clerk entered the room.

"No, sir," replied Elder, unblushingly.

"Did you see Ticknor in here during my temporary absence?"

"Yes, sir," answered the bookkeeper, glibly. "That is, I saw him come out just before you came back."

"Did you see any one else in here about that time?"

"No, sir."

"Are you positive there was no one else in here other than Ticknor?"

"Yes, sir."

"How do you know that?"

"I was on the way to give you that paper now lying on your desk, when I saw you leave the room. I went to the window in the reception-room to wait until you came back. While standing there I saw Ticknor come in and go into your room. After a time he came out again and went on through to the counting-room. You came in at that moment, and I followed you in and handed you the paper."

"That was the only time you were in my private room within the last half hour?"

"Yes, sir."

"I left a ten-dollar bill on my desk when I went out with the gentleman who paid it to me. When I returned the bill was gone. I am trying to find out where it went."

"Have you asked your office boy? He ought to know something about it as he was the only one in your room."

"You are wrong on that point, Mr. Elder. There was another person in this room at the same time Ticknor was here."

"Another person?" almost the bookkeeper. "I did not see——"

"I am quite satisfied you did not see her," said the broker, dryly. "Miss Dean, will you kindly repeat in Mr. Elder's presence what occurred in this office while you were here?"

Daisy told her story over again, and James Elder's face was a study during her recital of his treacherous act.

"Well, Mr. Elder, this is a serious accusation. What have you to say in your own defense?"

"The young lady's story is not true," said the bookkeeper, desperately. "She is simply trying to shield Ticknor, whom she thinks a great deal of. They have been very thick for weeks past, and it is only natural that——"

"Mr. Colt," demanded the girl, with an indignant flush mantling her cheeks, "do you believe my story, which I assert to be the absolute truth, or do you believe that man's denial of the facts? Look at his face. Is that the face of an honest person? Coward-like he is trying to give you a false impression of my friendship for Fred Ticknor. It is quite true that I like Fred very much indeed. He is the brightest and smartest boy in Wall Street, and I am sure he is above a mean or dishonest action. I have no apology to make for liking a boy of his manly and generous nature."

Daisy spoke with much spirit, and Fred cast a grateful glance at her. She gave Elder such a scornful look that the bookkeeper fairly wilted under it.

"Mr. Elder, I am sorry to say that your denial is very lame," said Mr. Colt. "The other day you came in to me and made a complaint against Ticknor, which shows that you are not on a friendly footing with the boy. Do you still deny the truthfulness of Miss Dean's statement?"

"You seem to be prejudiced against me, sir," replied the bookkeeper, in a low tone.

"I am bound to say that I am inclined to believe the evidence given by Miss Dean, for I have no reason to doubt her word. Ticknor flatly denies having touched the bill. How, then, did it get into his pocket? Miss Dean offers an explanation which incriminates you. In your denial your face and appearance contradicts your tongue. The preponderance of evidence is clearly against you. Whether you admit your guilt or not, I shall take no action on the matter, though it is a very discreditable affair for any man to be implicated in, for it was evidently not aimed at my interests, but prompted by personal feeling on your part against Ticknor. If you are really guilty it would be much more manly on your part to acknowledge it and make an unreserved apology for your conduct to Ticknor. That is all I have to say."

"I decline to make any further statement," replied Elder, doggedly.

"Very well. You may return to your desk."

"I prefer to resign my position in your office, sir."

"Very well, Mr. Elder. You may ask the cashier to pay you up to the end of the week. Turn your work over to Edwards."

James Elder walked out of the private room, got his money and left the office for good.

"If he hadn't left I should have waited in the corridor for him this afternoon and forced him to taking a picking or give me one," said Fred, in a resolute tone to Daisy, later on. "He's a dirty cur, and deserves no consideration."

"I am glad he has gone, for I could have had no respect for him after this," she answered.

"It was a good thing for me that you were in Mr. Colt's room and saw the whole thing, otherwise I probably would have been in a bad box. I wish to thank you for the way you stood up for me, Miss Dean. It was generous of you, and I shan't forget it. My mother and sister will feel grateful to you when I told them the story."

"I did no more than my duty, Fred, and deserve no thanks."

CHAPTER X.—The Deal in D. W. & P.

The other clerks in the office were surprised at the sudden departure of the bookkeeper, and as they had an idea that Fred knew the reason of his exit they took the first chance to corner him and ask questions on the subject. Fred, however, declined to injure his enemy's reputation, and referred his questioners to Mr. Colt. Of course it was absurd to think any one of them would approach the boss on the matter, and so their curiosity remained ungratified. Three weeks after this affair Fred discovered that a combination had been formed to control D. W. & P., which was then ruling at 72.

He immediately confided the news to Daisy and suggested that they combine their capital and buy all the shares they could afford. She considered the matter a while and finally consented to do it.

"I'm afraid you've made a speculator of me in spite of all my good resolutions," she laughed.

"Well, you have one advantage at any rate, Miss Dean," he said.

"What is that?"

"You will be connected with the luckiest boy in Wall Street," he grinned.

"Well, I suppose there is something in that. You do seem to be quite lucky in more ways than one."

"I certainly am. I was lucky to get out of that ten-dollar bill scrape."

"You were indeed. If I hadn't been a witness in your favor, Mr. Elder might have carried his point."

"That's right," agreed the young messenger. "How much money can you put into our pool, Miss Dean?"

"Twelve hundred dollars."

"And I'm going in for eight thousand dollars."

"We ought to be able to get quite a little block of D. W. & P. at 72."

"Well, you bring down one thousand and eighty dollars tomorrow, that will make you good for one hundred and fifty shares. I'll put in seven thousand two hundred dollars and collar one thousand for myself. I'll buy one thousand one hundred and fifty shares as the deal."

"Very well, Fred. I'll have the money on hand," she replied.

Next morning she handed her little roll to Fred and he made the purchase. Several days passed before there was any sign of a rise of more than a point in the stock they had invested in, then one day the shares jumped unexpectedly to 77.

"D. W. & P. is beginning to get a move on at last," Fred told her, when he came into her den with a bunch of work in his hand.

"I am delighted to hear it. I was beginning to fear that pointer you got hold of was a poor one."

"You needn't have any doubts about it, Miss Dean. I wouldn't risk seventy-two hundred dollars unless I felt pretty sure of my ground."

Next day, however, Fred got a pretty good scare. A heavy bear movement was launched against D. W. & P., and the shares tumbled down to 70, or two points below the price at which he had purchased the stock. He kept away from the stenographer's den, as he didn't want to alarm Daisy.

"If it goes down another point or two we'll be called on for additional margin, and I don't see how we'll be able to raise even one per cent. I begin to see how foolish it is to put up all of one's capital on a single deal. It will be tough if we lose our money. It's bad enough for me to lose my seventy-two hundred dollars, but Daisy—I don't like to think of it, for I induced her to go into this thing."

He was nervous for the rest of the day, though he became a bit reassured when the stock recovered and went to 72 5-8 before the Exchange closed. Then he had the courage to run in and tell the girl what happened.

"Never mind, Fred. I shan't blame you if this deal goes wrong," she said, laying her hand reassuringly on his arm. "You'll have your own troubles, you know. It is no silly thing to lose seventy-two hundred dollars."

Next morning D. W. & P. opened at 73, and by noon had gone up to 75.

"That's better," Fred told Daisy.

"Perhaps you ought to sell and let us make what we can out of it," she said.

"No," replied the boy. "I'll sell your one hundred and fifty if you say so, but I'm going to see this out, make or break."

"Then I won't sell. I'm willing to bank on your luck, one way or the other."

D. W. & P. fluctuated for several days, but to Fred's satisfaction it invariably closed higher than the day previous. When business shut down on Saturday the stock was ruling at 80. On Monday morning he ran into Murphy, who had been in the hospital with a bad leg.

"Hello, Murphy," he chuckled, "you're like a bad penny, aren't you?"

"What do you mean by that?" asked Spencer & Sysonby's messenger, suspiciously.

"You're bound to turn up."

"You're awfully funny, ain't you. If you had had my leg you'd have grinned on the other side of your face."

"Maybe I would. You had one satisfaction at any rate."

"What was that?"

"You didn't have to work for three months, and your wages went on just the same."

"Who said my wages went on?"

"I say so. Spencer & Sysonby wouldn't dock you for being on the sick list."

"You seem to know all about it."

"Well, isn't it a fact?"

"What of it?"

"Nothing, except as I remarked you got your pay for doing nothing while I had to hustle for mine."

"I thought you liked to hustle?"

"So I do. By the way, you didn't hear that I made sixty-five hundred dollars on D. & G. about the time that leg of yours gave out, did you?"

"What are you givin' me?"

"Givin' you nothing. I'm only telling you a bit of news."

"Well, don't give me any such steer as that."

"Don't you believe me?"

"I should say not. How could you make sixty-five hundred dollars on D. & G.?"

"By being on the right side of the market, of course."

"Where would you get the money to put up on margin?"

"You didn't know I carried a little dough-bag of my own, did you?"

"No, I didn't know it. You can't jolly me the first day I'm out of the hospital. How's things on the Street since I've been laid up?"

"We've slaughtered a few of the lambs and their fleece is hanging up in a number of the offices."

"It that all you know? That doesn't interest me."

"That's all, Murphy. Ta-ta, I'm going down Broad," and Fred darted off like a winged Mercury.

"Well, he makes me tired about his winnin' sixty-five hundred dollars on D. & G. What does he take me for, anyway? He's a stuff, that's what he is."

He spoke the last sentence aloud, and a young man standing near by, who had seen him part from Fred, caught the words, and he quickly stepped up to him.

"Hello, Owen Murphy," he said in a friendly way; "glad to see you back again. What's been the matter with you?"

Murphy looked at the chap and recognized James Elder. Elder had never noticed Murphy before, though each knew the other by sight. Murphy was therefore surprised that the book-keeper should speak to him. He was also surprised to see Elder on the street at that hour, looking like a gentlemen of leisure, when he ought to be at work at his desk.

"Ain't you workin' for Mr. Colt any more?" he asked in some surprise.

"No. Left there some time ago, and all on account of that lobster who just left you."

"Do you mean Fred Ticknor?"

"That's just who I do mean."

"What did he do to you?"

"He did enough to make me down on him like a cartload of bricks. Now look here, Murphy, you're not stuck on him a terrible lot, are you?"

"I dunno as I am. He kind of thinks himself a whole lot more than he is."

"That's right—he does," assented James Elder. "He ought to be taken down a peg or two. What do you think?"

"I think so, too," agreed Murphy.

"What's the matter with you and me doing it?" suggested the ex-bookkeeper.

"How are we going to do it?"

"You leave that to me. Are you with me in this?"

"That depends on what you want me to do. I don't want to get in no trouble. I'd like to get square with him for the way he refused to divvy when he found a pocketbook in the Mills Building some time ago."

"Wouldn't he divvy with you?"

"No. He went and hunted up the owner, and then he wouldn't tell me whether he got anythin' for handin' it over. I'll bet he got a hundred plunks. I ought to have got half of that," said Murphy in an aggrieved tone.

"Of course you ought to have got half of the reward. But that's just like him. I know him better than you do. Now you stand in with me and we'll get square with him together."

"I'd like to know what you want to do to him first," said Murphy, cautiously.

"I haven't decided yet. I'll meet you in a day or two and let you know."

"All right," replied the messenger, starting to move off.

"Don't let him know you met me or he'll suspect something is in the wind. Do you understand?"

"I won't say a word," Murphy assured him, and then they separated.

"Nothing like having a cat's-paw to do your dirty work," chuckled James Elder, rubbing his hands together as he walked up Nassau street.

CHAPTER XI.—A Dandy Scoop.

After Fred returned to the office from his Broad street errand he had to hustle over to the Exchange with an important note to a broker who attended to Mr. Colt's business on the floor. When he arrived there he found that there was a good deal of excitement around the D. W. & P. standard. Some announcement had been made in reference to the road that had caused a rush on the part of many brokers to get some of the stock which suddenly appeared to be scarce, and as a consequence spirited bidding for the shares sent the price booming.

As Fred stepped up to the rail and asked for the broker he wanted to deliver the note to, one thousand shares of D. W. & P. exchanged hands at 88. Fred, when he saw the quotation posted on the board, felt like standing on his head from very joy, for it showed him to be something like sixteen thousand dollars ahead of the game.

"Daisy will be tickled to death when I tell her," he said to himself.

He was just as pleased to think the girl was making a haul as he was to make one himself. There was a sort of high jinks on the floor that morning. A great many of the brokers had attended their lodges the preceding night and some of them were full of the Old Nick in spite of their interest in the rise of D. W. & P. and other stocks. They showed in a variety of ways that were childlike and bland, but not quite so amusing to their victims.

"They're a gay lot," mused Fred, as he watched some of the antics that occurred under his eyes while he was waiting for an attendant to find his man and bring him to the rail. "It would be worth as much as his life for an outsider to get in on the floor this morning. They wouldn't do a thing to him."

At this point the broker came up and Fred delivered his note.

"All right," was the answer he got, and he left the howling scene behind.

As soon as he got back to the office he rushed in to Daisy to tell her that D. W. & P. had reached 88 and was to all appearances bound to go much higher.

"Isn't that grand!" she exclaimed. "Your luck clings to you, I see."

"And you're getting a slice of it. If I was only five years older I'll bet you'd be setting your cap for me," he grinned.

"You ridiculous boy!" she cried, throwing a light ruler after him as he vanished through the doorway.

D. W. & P. closed at 90 that day and opened at 90 1-8 in the morning. Half the brokers on the floor seemed to be making a play for the stock, and those who held it were not letting much of it out. By noon D. W. & P. was the center of a whirlwind of perspiring traders, and as high as 98 was offered with few takers. Fred dropped in with a note about half-past twelve, and he could not remember when he had ever seen such an uproar outside of a panic. D. W. & P. had reached 100 3-8 and the excitement was terrific.

The boy himself was thrilled not only by the scene but by the realization that if he cashed in at that moment he would win a matter of $28,000. He was fascinated by the scene before him. Even as he stood there, 500 shares of the stock were sold at 101.

"My gracious! How high is it going? At the rate it is jumping it will be up to 110 or 112 by three o'clock. Will the stock stand it? Suppose a screw would suddenly work loose? Suppose somebody should all at once begin dumping big blocks on the market, what would happen? If a panic should set in Daisy and I would be swamped in the shuffle."

A sale of eight hundred shares were just then recorded at 102.

"Why, I'm worth two thousand dollars more than when I came in here five minutes ago," he breathed. "I can't stand this. I'm making money too fast to be sure it's real. I am going to sell right away and make sure of what is in sight."

As soon as he delivered his message, which took time on account of the mix-up on the floor, he made for the door as fast as he could go, and dashed for Nassau street. It seemed as if he couldn't reach the little bank soon enough.

"What is D. W. & P. going at now?" he asked the margin clerk.

"Why don't you look at the tape?" asked the margin clerk.

"I can't get within a mile of the ticker. Look at that mob around it."

"You own some shares, don't you?"

"Yes," replied Fred. "Eleven-fifty."

"Well, it's my opinion you'd better sell before something happens."

"That's what I came here for. Here's my memorandum. Just close me out at the market price right away. If I hold on any longer I'll go clean daffy."

"They'll be sold inside of five minutes," replied the clerk, going to the telephone to communicate with the bank's representative at the Exchange.

When Fred reached the office the indicator there was ticking prices off like mad, and an excited throng was around it. Every little while one of the crowd would rush up to the margin clerk and order some stock sold, and then walk away with a look of relief on his face.

"I've sold out, Daisy," cried Fred, rushing into the stenographer's room. "I beg your pardon—Miss Dean, I mean," he corrected himself with a red face.

"Don't apologize, Fred," laughed the girl. "I have no objection to you calling me Daisy since we're partners, you know. What did you sell at?"

"Blessed if I know. I told the clerk to close us out at the market figure. The last sale I heard of was eight hundred at 102."

"Why, that is thirty dollars a share over what we paid for it."

"That's right. Some people will make a raft of money out of this rise."

"And somebody else will have to lose it to make that profit good."

The statement that Fred received in the next morning's mail showed that his D. W. & P. shares had been sold at 102 3-8, thus giving him a profit of thirty thousand dollars. Daisy's one hundred and fifty shares netted her forty-five hundred dollars.

"Are you satisfied, Miss Daisy?" he asked her, after figuring up what was due the young lady.

"Perfectly," she replied. "I am quite a capitalist now, being worth fifty-seven hundred dollars."

"Don't let it get into the newspapers, or you'll be swamped with offers of marriage and propositions from promoters of all kinds of enterprises who would like to use your money in their business," grinned Fred.

Daisy laughed and resumed her work, which was a quiet hint to the boy to return to his duties in the reception-room.

CHAPTER XII.—Foul Play.

"Well, Bess," said Fred that night, when he and his sister were sitting by themselves in the cozy little dining-room. "I chased another pointer to cover the other day."

"Did you?" she answered, growing interested at once. "It must have been a winner, judging by your happy face this evening."

"Bet your life it was a winner."

"Tell me all about it. How did you come to get it?"

Fred informed her.

"I bought a thousand shares on the strength of it."

"My! That was a lot. How much did you have to put up?"

"Seven thousand two hundred."

"Gracious! I don't see how you dared risk all that money. Suppose the stock had gone down instead of up, you would have lost all your capital."

"That's a chance you must take in Wall Street; but I believed I had a pretty sure thing, and the result proved I was right. I sold out yesterday at thirty points and a fraction advance, consequently I'm thirty thousand dollars richer to-day than I was two weeks ago."

"Thirty thousand dollars!" exclaimed Bessie, thinking he was joking.

"Yes, Bess. Here is a certificate of deposit showing my present financial standing at the bank," and he showed the paper which represented the bank's obligation to pay Fred Ticknor the sum of thirty-eight thousand dollars on demand.

That Bessie was amazed goes without saying.

"Why, if you keep on this way you'll be a millionaire some day," she said.

"I'll be satisfied with less, but if it comes my way I'm not going to let it get by me," grinned her brother.

"Are you going to tell mother? She has no idea you're worth more than a few hundred."

"I'm afraid it might give her an attack of heart failure," chuckled Fred.

"We might break the news to her gently," laughed his sister.

"Well, you can give her a hint that I'm making money in the market, and maybe after a while I'll let her know the real facts."

"I heard her telling Mrs. Smith, in the flat across the hall, the other night, what a smart boy you are, and how she expected that some day you'd be a Wall Street broker yourself."

"Stranger things than that have happened. There are quite a number of successful traders downtown who once were poor messenger boys."

Next morning when Fred was crossing Wall Street toward Broad he saw Murphy on the corner talking to a man whom he recognized as James Elder. He saw the ex-bookkeeper pass Murphy something that looked like a pocketbook, but owing to the distance he couldn't tell exactly. That afternoon when he started for lunch he found Murphy standing down at the door smoking a cigarette.

"Goin' to lunch?" asked Murphy, carelessly.

"Yes," replied Fred.

"Then I'll go with you."

Fred had no objection to his company, as they often went together to the same quick-lunch house on lower Broad street. So they walked along together, Murphy doing all the talking, and trying to interest Fred in his favorite topic. At last they reached the restaurant and entered. A heavily bearded man, who had been standing for some time in front of the restaurant, followed them inside and squeezed himself into a seat alongside of Fred. Murphy took the stool on the other side of his companion. The place was pretty well crowded. There were tables at the back for ladies, and soon after the boys had taken their seats Daisy Dean entered.

As she passed down to a vacant chair her sharp eyes noticed Fred and Murphy, whom she knew as Spencer & Sysonby's messenger. Happening to glance in their direction after she had given her order, she saw Murphy take a red article from his pocket and leaning against Fred, put his hand around Ticknor's waist and drop the thing into his pocket next to the bearded man. She thought that was a funny thing for Murphy to do, and at once suspected that he playing some joke on his companion. She decided to tell Fred as soon as she returned to the office. The boys finished their lunch and started for the pay counter. As they did so the bearded man jumped down from his stool, put his hand into his pocket and started after them.

"Not so fast, young man," he said, putting his hand on Fred's shoulder. "I'll trouble you for my pocketbook."

"Your pocketbook!" exclaimed Fred, in astonishment. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, you know what I mean well enough," replied the man in a loud voice, which attracted immediate attention. "You're a sneak thief, and I'm going to have you arrested."

"You must be crazy, replied Fred, indignantly.

"What's the trouble?" asked the manager of the restaurant, forcing his way through the crowd that was beginning to collect around the bearded man and the two boys.

"This young rascal has stolen my pocketbook," replied the accuser, vehemently.

"I guess you're off your perch," retorted Fred, angrily.

"How do you know he took your pocketbook," replied the manager, who knew Fred by sight as a regular customer.

"How do I know it? He sat alongside of me, and as he got down off his stool I felt him brush against me. I put my hand in my pocket and found my wallet gone, so I know he must have taken it. Call an officer and have him searched."

"What kind of a pocketbook was it?" asked the manager.

"It was a red morocco one, with my name, John Thomas, stamped upon the flap."

"You'd better turn your pockets out to satisfy this man," said the manager to Fred.

"I think this is an outrage," objected the boy, his face blazing with indignation. "My name is Ticknor, and I work for Colt & Co., of No. — Wall Street. It is ridiculous to charge me with such a thing as stealing a pocketbook."

"That's right," interposed Murphy at this point. "I know him, and he wouldn't steal nothin'."

"I believe you're his pal," roared the bearded man, "and are just as bad as he is."

"I'll prove you're a liar," said Murphy. "Here's a broker outside I know. I'll bring him in to prove who we are."

Thus speaking, Murphy made his way out of the crowd and started for the street. When he got there he made tracks for Wall Street, leaving Fred to his own resources. The bearded man in the meanwhile insisted that Fred be searched, and as the easiest way out of the trouble the manager undertook to do that himself, feeling satisfied that the whole thing was a mistake. Somebody noticed a policeman outside and called him in just as the manager pulled the red morocco wallet out of Fred's pocket.

"What did I tell you?" roared the bearded man. "That's my pocketbook, and my name is on it. Open it and you'll find a five-dollar bill and some papers."

The manager opened it and found everything as described. Fred was too astonished and dumfounded to say a word.

"What's the matter here?" asked the officer, forcing his way through the mob.

"Officer, that boy stole my pocketbook, and I want him arrested," said the bearded man, insistently.

"What have you to say for yourself, young man?" asked the surprised manager. "How came this man's wallet in your pocket?"

"I have no idea how it got there," replied Fred, flushed and confounded by the unfortunate circumstance. "All I know is that I didn't take it."

The crowd, none of whom knew the boy, were satisfied of his guilt the moment the pocketbook was produced and identified by its owner.

"I'll have to take you to the station, young fellow," said the cop. "You must go along and make a charge against him."

"I'll do it," said the accuser, nodding his head vigorously.

"Stand back there!" cried the policeman to the crowd, as he began to push Fred toward the door and the sidewalk. Everybody was jostled about, and a stout man, in an endeavor to get clear of the mob, accidentally struck the boy's accuser a sliding blow in the face with his big elbow. One of the buttons on his coat-sleeve caught in the man's thick hair, and off came the false whiskers as clear as if a cyclone had shaved him. Fred, the officer and several of the people saw the accident, and the boy recognized the disagreeable countenance of his enemy, James Elder.

With an exclamation of surprise Fred made a grasp at the ex-bookkeeper.

The fellow, however, seeing that he was exposed, pushed his way through the doorway and dashed around the corner of Beaver street. Fred wrenched himself from the officer and started after him. The cop himself and some of the crowd followed after. Elder, however, managed to elude pursuit and escaped.

"That was a put-up job on me, officer," said Fred, when the policeman reached his side. "That chap was formerly employed by Mr. Colt, my boss, and lost his situation through a dirty trick he tried to play on me. He thought he'd get me into trouble through this pocketbook scheme, and might have succeeded in putting me to a lot of shame and trouble only that his disguise came off. I'm going to put this thing into the hands of a detective and see if I can't have him arrested and punished."

CHAPTER XIII.—Fred Buys Some Worthless Shares.

He found Daisy in her room looking the picture of distress. She jumped up and ran to him as soon as she saw him.

"Oh, Fred! What was all the trouble about at the restaurant. I heard people say that you were accused of stealing a pocketbook. Just as if you would do such a thing!"

He rehearsed the incident from beginning to end.

"So you see, Daisy, that rascal, James Elder, was at the bottom of the whole thing."

"Did you say it was a red pocketbook, Fred?"

"Yes, a red Morocco one."

"Well, Fred, I've got something to tell you. I'm satisfied it was your friend Murphy put that wallet in your pocket."

"Murphy!" exclaimed Fred, in some astonishment.

"Yes. I was in the restaurant while you boys were there. I saw Murphy reach around your back and drop what looked to me like a red pocketbook into the right-hand pocket of your jacket."

"That's the pocket it was found in."

"Then I thought he tapped the bearded man who sat alongside of you on the arm, but I am not sure. I'm afraid Murphy is no friend of yours."

"I believe you're right," said Fred. "I remember now I saw Murphy talking to Elder this morning on the corner of Broad street, and I saw Elder pass something into his hand which he put into his pocket. Well, that settles Murphy and me for keeps, and it's not unlikely he hasn't seen the end of the matter yet. I'm going to hire a detective to catch Elder, and when he gets to court Murphy may be called on to make an explanation."

Fred waited for Murphy that afternoon. The latter seemed to be surprised to see Ticknor. It had been his impression that Fred was behind the bars.

"Well, Murphy, what have you to say for yourself?" asked Fred, with a stern countenance. "When I got into trouble about that pocketbook you sneaked."

"I started to get somebody to identify you," replied Murphy, shamefacedly.

"Oh, you did," answered Ticknor, sarcastically.

"Sure I did. How did you get out of it?"

"I got out of it all right. Now how are you going to square yourself?"

"What do you mean?" asked Murphy with a startled look.

"How much did you get from James Elder for putting that wallet in my pocket?"

"He didn't give me nothin'," replied Murphy doggedly.

"Miss Dean, our stenographer, was in the restaurant when we were there, and she distinctly saw you take a red pocketbook from your pocket and put it into the right-hand pocket of my jacket."

"It's a lie!" roared Murphy.

"All right. Just as soon as Elder is arrested I'm going to have you up in court, too. You've played a dirty trick on me and I'm going to make you sweat for it."

Fred turned on his heel, leaving Murphy dazed and frightened. Next day Fred told Mr. Colt about the pocketbook affair, and the broker was much incensed against his late bookkeeper. He told Ticknor that he would get one of the Wall Street detectives to look after James Elder, and would help put the rascal through. That same afternoon Fred heard Mr. Colt tell a big customer that if he wanted to make a safe deal he would advise him to buy L. & M. shares, and hold them for a ten-point rise. That set the boy thinking whether he hadn't better buy some of the shares himself. At the first chance he got he went in and had a talk with Daisy about the advisability of making use of the pointer.

"What is L. & M. ruling at, Fred?"

"About 113."

"I think it would be safe if you didn't use over half your capital."

"That's my opinion. Are you with me in this?"

Daisy made some calculations on a pad.

"I'll bring enough money down for you to buy me three hundred shares. That will leave twenty-three hundred dollars leeway to make good any additional margin if the stock should go down a bit."

"All right. I'll risk the purchase of two thousand shares."

He got the shares for himself and Daisy next day at 113. In two days the shares went up to 115. During the ensuing week L. & M. went up slowly by eighths until it roosted at 120. Then Fred told Daisy that he intended to sell at that figure.

Accordingly Fred sold out next morning at 120 1-8. His profit on the deal amounted to thirteen thousand five hundred dollars, raising his capital to fifty-one thousand five hundred dollars. He took the five hundred dollars home and presented it to his mother as a birthday gift. A few days afterward he met George Bates, the big operator, on the street.

"Hello, Ticknor," he said. "I'm glad to see you. Why haven't you been around to my office? You promised to call, and it's more than six months since I had the pleasure of making your acquaintance."

"I didn't want to bother you, sir, as I understand you're a busy man."

"Oh, nonsense! I'm busy, of course. I have large interests which take up a great deal of my attention, but still I have a few moments to give to my friends. How are you getting along? You're looking first-class."

"I'm getting on all right, sir."

"Well, drop in and see me between three and four some day soon."

"All right, sir; I will."

That evening after supper, while Fred was sitting in the dining-room reading the sporting edition of an afternoon paper, there came a knock on the door. Bessie answered the summons and admitted a lady who lived on the floor below. She had a bundle in her hand done up in old newspapers.

"I hope I am not intruding," said the lady, whose name was Parker.

"Not at all," replied Bessie. "Sit right down. Mother will be back in a few minutes. She stepped across the hall to see Mrs. Smith."

"Very well, my dear. The purport of my visit is this. Your brother, I understand, is employed in a broker's office in Wall Street. I have some shares of mining stock here that my husband took in satisfaction of a debt several years ago. I don't know whether they're worth anything or not. We haven't looked at them for a long time. My husband tried to dispose of them when he got them first, but nobody would buy them at more than a few cents a share, and so we kept them. We are going to move to New Jersey soon and, as we need all the money we can get, I thought I would see if I can realize something on these shares."

"What are the shares, Mrs. Parker?" asked Fred, very politely.

"You may look at them."

She took the string off the bundle, opened it and handed the certificates to the boy. He glanced over the top one. It was a certificate for one thousand shares of the Paradise Gold and Silver Mining Company, of Tonopah, Nevada, par value fifty dollars per share. There were fifteen certificates in the bunch, each calling for one thousand shares.

"This is Western mining stock, ma'am," said Fred. "I have no idea what it is worth, but I will try and find out for you to-morrow."

"I shall consider it a great favor if you will," replied the lady, gratefully.

Fred made a note of the name of the mine and its location in his memorandum book and promised to attend to the matter. He then re-wrapped the stock and handed the package back to her.

"I hope it is worth something," she said, "for we need the money."

Next day Fred asked Mr. Colt about the stock.

"What did you say its name was?" asked the broker.

"Paradise Gold and Silver Mining Company."

"I've got a block of ten thousand shares I'd be glad to sell for ten cents if I could get it," said Mr. Colt. "It's been in my safe these three years."

"You've no idea what it is actually worth, sir?"

"It isn't worth anything to speak about, as there is no market for it. It was taken off the Western exchanges two years or more ago. How many shares does the lady own?"

"She has fifteen thousand shares."

"Well, I wouldn't give a cent a share for it."

Fred asked several other brokers about it, and they were all agreed that the certificates were little better than waste paper.

The boy called on Mrs. Parker that evening and reported the result of his investigations. She seemed greatly disappointed.

"I had calculated on getting something for it, if only one hundred dollars. We really are in pressing need of that amount of money."

She spoke so earnestly that Fred felt sorry for her.

"Well, Mrs. Parker, I'll take them off your hands at a cent a share and run the risk of losing my money," he said, after a little reflection. "It is possible I may some day find a customer for them, but that is hardly likely, unless they should be relisted on the exchanges, which will not happen without some good reason."

Mrs. Parker said she would be glad to dispose of the certificates for one hundred and fifty dollars, and so next evening Fred brought the money home with him and paid for the stock.

CHAPTER XIV.—A Desperate Fix.

Fred put the shares in his trunk and forgot all about them in a day or two. One afternoon he called on Mr. Bates at his office in the Vanderpool Building in Exchange Place. The big millionaire operator happened to be at leisure, and he cordially welcomed the boy. In the course of their conversation Mr. Bates drew out the fact that Fred had used that five hundred dollars which he received for returning the pocketbook to the operator in a stock deal that had panned him out a profit of six hundred dollars.

"You were fortunate, Ticknor," he said, with a smile; "very fortunate indeed. And what did you do with the eleven hundred dollars?"

"Well, sir, I gave two hundred dollars to my mother and fifty dollars to my sister, and the greater part of the balance I shortly after invested in L. & S. shares on the customary margin."

"With what result?" asked Mr. Bates, in an interested tone.

"I was lucky again, sir. You see, I bought fifty shares at 90 and thirty more at 94. The stock got a boom on and I sold at 112 5-8, clearing sixteen hundred and fifty dollars."

"You certainly did remarkably well. Did you do any more speculating?"

"Yes, sir. I heard one day that there was going to be a rise in D. & G., so I invested in three hundred shares of the stock at 65, sold at 87, and made sixty-five hundred dollars clear."

"That five-hundred-dollar bill seems to have been the cornerstone of luck for you."

"Yes, sir."

"Was that your last deal?"

"No, sir. Shortly afterward I bought one thousand shares of D. W. & P. at 72, and I held on until it went to 102 5-8. I made thirty thousand dollars on that spec."

Mr. Bates whistled.

"It seems to me you're the young wonder of Wall Street. What else have you been guilty of in that line?"

"Well," smiled Fred, "I bought two thousand L. & M. the other day and cleared nearly fourteen thousand dollars."

"Say, Ticknor, that isn't a ghost story you're giving me, is it?"

"No, sir. It's the honest truth."

"What other deals have you been engaged in?"

"That's all."

"That's all, eh? Upon my word, it's enough, I think, for a boy your years inside of six months. And all the time you were attending to your regular work as messenger for Mr. Colt?"

"Yes, sir."

"Marvelous! You are a born speculator, truly. May I ask how much you are worth, if it is a fair question?"

"Something like fifty-one thousand dollars, not speaking of about fifteen thousand shares of Paradise Gold & Silver Mining shares, which have no particular value."

"Have you fifteen thousand shares of that Tonopah stock?" exclaimed the operator, in surprise.

"I have."

"How came you to get it?"

Fred told him.

"I advise you to hold on to it, young man. It will be worth anywhere from twenty-five cents to one dollar a share inside of six months."

"How do you know that, sir?" asked Fred, in surprise.

"I have reason to know that it will. Now, don't let this go any farther, for I have given you this information in confidence. In three months the Paradise mine will be listed again on the Western exchanges, and at a price not less than ten cents a share."

"Gee! I guess there isn't any doubt now that I'm the luckiest boy in Wall Street."

"You certainly are."

"Well, I know where there are ten thousand more shares of Paradise stock. Would you advise me to try and buy them?"

"By all means. You ought to be able to see them for a song. I've bought all I could find in the city at less than five cents a share. I'll give you ten cents a share for that block you speak about if you get it, but it will pay you better to hold it yourself."

"Thank you, sir. I guess I can afford to hold it if I am able to induce the owner to part with it."

Next day Fred told Mr. Colt that he thought he could find him a purchaser for his stock of Paradise stock if he was willing to let it go for a cent a share.

The broker shook his head.

"I'll accept two and a half cents a share for it, but nothing lower."

In a day or two Fred brought him two hundred and fifty dollars and took the stock. It was about this time that our hero got on to the fact that a syndicate was being formed to boom D. & L. Fred spent several days investigating the tip, but he found out very little. Those on the inside were not giving away any of their plans to the outsiders.

The boy had his customary confabs with Daisy on the subject, but couldn't make up his mind whether to go into a deal in the stock or not, notwithstanding the apparent value of his pointer.

He kept a close eye on D. & L. and in a short time it began to forge ahead. After it had jumped from 89 to 95, Fred concluded to buy three thousand shares, and Daisy went in it to the extent of five hundred shares with him. That same day it rose to 98, and two days later it was ruling at 105.

"This looks like another lucky deal," he told the stenographer.

Daisy nodded her head and kept on with her work, for she was very busy that day, having secured several new customers. Fred went back to his chair in the waiting-room and began to build air-castles about his future prospects.

"I'm about thirty thousand ahead so far on this deal. In fact, I may even double my capital and reach the hundred thousand mark. If the brokers knew I had taken that amount out of the Street they'd have a fit and would begin putting up all sorts of games on me to try and get it back again. Well, I mustn't halloa before I get out of the woods. I haven't made the hundred thousand yet."

Just then a couple of well-dressed men entered the office. One of them carried a small Russian leather hand-bag. He asked if Mr. Colt was in.

"Yes, sir," replied Fred, looking hard at the visitor, for somehow or another he did not like his face.

"We'd like to see him."

"What's your names and business?"

"As far as our names go, we are strangers to Mr. Colt; our business, however, is to dispose of some United States bonds."

"Very well, sir; I will tell him."

Mr. Colt, not being busy, said he would see the visitors, and so Fred showed them into the private office. Fred thought nothing more about them until he saw one of the men come out with a paper in his hand, which he carried over to the cashier's window.

"Mr. Colt has bought their bonds," he thought.

The cashier happened to be out at the moment, and the visitor had to wait until he returned to his den. The man seemed to be very nervous and impatient, and drummed with his fingers on the window ledge. Fred was standing near the ticker, with the tape in his fingers, and the nervous movements of the men attracted his notice. Finally the man put his hand to his hip pocket to draw out his handkerchief, and the boy saw the polished butt of a revolver sticking out.

"Gee!" breathed Fred, "that chap is well heeled. If a cop saw what I did just now he'd run him in, and the magistrate would soak him ten dollars fine for carrying a concealed weapon."

A couple of customers came in and went directly to the ticker, so Fred withdrew. The cashier now appeared, and the man with the concealed revolver pushed the paper through the window to him. He looked at it, laid it on his desk and went to the safe. Fred saw him counting out a big wad of bills. Just then the cashier called him over to the window.

"Take this money in to Mr. Colt," he said to Fred.

"But I want that money," objected the visitor at the window. "I handed you an order for it."

"I know you did, sir," replied the cashier; "but as it is rather unusual for us to pay out such a large amount in cash, I prefer to send it directly to Mr. Colt, who will, of course, pay it over to you himself."

"Very well," replied the man, gruffly. "Give it to me and I will take it in to him."

"That is unnecessary," replied the cashier. "The office boy will take it. It is part of his business."

As he passed the money through the window to Fred it looked for a moment as if the stranger intended to snatch it. Such was probably his first intention, but he reconsidered it and followed closely on Fred's heels as the boy went toward the private office. Fred opened the door and entered the room. A startling tableau met his gaze and paralyzed him for the moment.

The other caller, who had remained in the private room while his companion went to the cashier's window with the order for the money the lad held in his hand, was standing beside the broker's desk with a revolver pointed at his head. He uttered an oath when he saw Fred enter the room, and the boy was about to cry out, when the man behind him closed the door quickly and seized him, pressing one hand over his mouth. In the scuffle that ensued, deadened by the thick rug on the floor, Fred dropped the money.

Then the villain holding Fred exclaimed to his partner:

"Pick it up, and we'll be off as soon as I choke this kid into unconsciousness. Give your man a tap over the head with the butt of your gun."

Fred heard the words and felt the man's other hand creeping around to his throat. Fred sank his strong fingers into his captor's throat. The fellow uttered a cry of pain and mechanically released the pressure on the boy's mouth.

"Crack the young imp on the head before he yells out!" hissed the discomfited rascal.

Fred squirmed around the man to save himself, and as he did so his hand came into contact with the butt of the revolver sticking out of the chap's hip pocket. It happened to be a self-cocker, and as Fred's fingers slipped around the trigger as well as the butt, in pulling it out the hammer rose and fell under the pressure, and the unexpected explosion which followed nearly stunned the boy, whose head was within a few inches of the muzzle. The man himself uttered a cry and fell to the floor, for the bullet had entered his thigh, while Fred staggered to his knees with the smoking pistol in his hand.

CHAPTER XV.—Conclusion.

The report of the revolver, coupled with the man's cry, startled the entire office, and even attracted notice in the corridor outside. The cashier and two of the clerks ran out of the counting-room and, followed by the customers in the waiting-room, made a line for Mr. Colt's sanctum. Inside of two minutes an excited throng was crowding into Mr. Colt's office, all agog with excitement and curiosity.

The cashier himself had recovered the money, and was speaking to Mr. Colt, while Fred, with the revolver still in his hand, was keeping the mob from crowding into the small room. Finally Fred succeeded in closing the door in their faces and putting his back against it.

"Send for the police," exclaimed the broker, in a tone that showed he had not quite recovered from the shock to which he had been subjected. As a matter of fact, an officer was even then trying to force his way through the crowd which blocked the approaches to the office. Fred opened the door and let him enter the room. He had a pair of handcuffs in his pocket, and he soon put these on the uninjured rascal's wrists. He then took up Mr. Colt's desk 'phone, connected with the station, and called for the patrol wagon. By this time there were two reporters on the scene trying to collect the facts.

Finally the excitement in the building subsided with the departure of the prisoners, but a stream of brokers filed in to call on Mr. Colt to learn the inside particulars of the trouble. As soon as the real facts got around Fred was regarded as the hero of the occasion. The afternoon editions said a lot of nice things about him, and long before he got home the news had been carried to his mother by talkative neighbors.

"You're the bravest boy in Wall Street," Daisy told him, when he had modestly given her a full account of the affair.

"Pshaw! I only did my duty, Daisy."

The market had closed for the day before he thought about his stock deal. Then he looked the tape over for the latest quotations of D. & L. It had gone up to 110.

Next day he had to go with Mr. Colt and the cashier to the Tombs Police Court to give his testimony at the examination. The rascals, only one of whom was able to appear, were held for the action of the grand jury. An indictment was in due time found against them; they were subsequently tried and sent to Sing Sing for a term of years. On returning from the police court Fred dropped into the little bank on Nassau street.

The tape showed that D. & L. was then going at 117, so Fred ordered the deal closed out at that figure. He cleared fifty thousand dollars by the transaction, which placed his financial standing with the bank at one hundred and one thousand dollars. Daisy pocketed eight thousand dollars, which made her worth, all told, sixteen thousand dollars. Fred did not forget what Mr. Bates, the millionaire operator, had told him about the prospects of the Paradise Gold & Silver Mining Company. Three months passed, however, and the mine had not showed any signs of coming to life again.

"I think I'll drop in and see Mr. Bates again," he said, as he left the office a little before three with the day's deposits that he was taking to the bank.

That gentlemen told Fred the mine would prove an El Dorado in another year's time.

Mr. George Bates proved to be a good prophet, for within the year Paradise was selling for fifty-five cents a share. Fred is now cashier for Mr. Colt, and earning a good salary, but he is still making money for both himself and Daisy Dean, the stenographer, in the market.

As he came of age this year, he is now able to keep a regular account in one of the big Wall Street banks, and signs his name legally to checks. Moreover, he and Daisy Dean are engaged to be married. He still does his trading through the little bank in Nassau street, the cashier of which maintains that he is the luckiest boy in Wall Street.

Next week's issue will contain "RISING IN THE WORLD; or, FROM FACTORY BOY TO MANAGER."

MAN KILLING WHITE TIGER SLAIN BY INDIAN RAJAH

Sportsmen all over India are greatly interested in the skin of a white tiger recently shot by the Maharaja of Sirguja and which is now on display at Calcutta.

Except for a few darker stripings the pelt is almost pure white and measures nine feet eight inches from nose to tail tip. The white tiger is extremely rare, but few specimens ever having been secured, and this one is reported to have had a career of depredation that included three human victims and innumerable cattle.

According to reports from the district in which it was killed, the beast actually appeared to use its unusual coloration as an aid to hunting. It was continually mistaken for a steer or cow as it lay quietly among the herds without exciting alarm.

CURRENT NEWS

COWS' INTELLIGENCE

Lil and Red, cows owned by Ezra Edgell of Smithfield, W. Va., saved their own lives when Fishing Creek rose to record flood stage. The cows planted their front hoofs against the side of their barn, keeping their noses out of the water, which would have drowned them had it risen three inches more, as a haymow above held their heads down. The horses and another cow in the same barn were drowned.

BULLET DROPS FROM SKY

Appealing to Yonkers police for an investigation, Donald Buchanan, twenty-seven, No. 107 Oliver avenue, Yonkers, N. Y., reported recently he had narrowly escaped death on Saw Mill River Road when a stray .45 calibre steel-jacketed bullet went through the rim of his straw hat, ploughed its way down his back and lodged in his clothing.

Police believe a Yonkers sportsman, practicing with a high-powered rifle, fired into the air and the bullet, in its descent, went through Buchanan's hat and down his back by sheer weight.

DUCKS ARE BOMB VICTIMS

Hundreds of ducks were victims of recent army practice in phosphorus bomb and grenade throwing at the proving grounds at Aberdeen, Md. After the tests were made army officers were amazed to find large numbers of dead ducks in the neighboring waters of Chesapeake Bay.

An investigation showed that the dead ducks had eaten fragments of unconsumed phosphorus which had fallen in the water of their feeding grounds.

Now when tests are to be made, says Hygeia, the soldiers are using devices to frighten the birds away and the bombs are being exploded either over land or over deep water where ducks do not feed.

Buy "Mystery Magazine"

Handsome Colored Covers

Sixty-four Pages of Reading

No. 162 IS OUT TODAY, CONTAINING A Lively Detective Novelette, by GROVER KIDWELL, entitled

"THE INTRIGUERS"

It has a splendid plot and is full of exciting adventures
DON'T MISS THE NEW TWO-PART SERIAL

"A TEST OF CONSCIENCE"

By J. B. WARRENTON

And the seven interesting short stories:

"LAWFULLY SWINDLED," by Glenn A. Gravatt

"P. O. P. TAKES A HAND," by H. Belanger

"LET THE GUILTY MAN SUFFER," by Anne H. Hadley

"A GLASS OF WATER," by Jack Bechdolt

"VERY NEARLY PERFECT," by Noble W. Hunt

"THE GIRL IN THE RED MASK," by David F. Galvin

"PROVERBS AND A CASH BOX," by B. M. Goldenberger

In addition there is an article by POLICE-CAPTAIN HOWARD

"THE LAST OF THE GANGSTERS"

Also a number of shorter items:

"A Woman Detective," "Hunt a Dumpy Bandit," "Recaptured Convicts," "Alleged Fence Arrested," "Control of Detective Agencies," "Mystery in Mail Theft" and a Beautiful Woman Led a Crook Gang."

FREE HANDWRITING READINGS

By LOUISE RICE

Send her a sample of your writing and she will tell your character and advise you about what you are best fitted for.

THERE'S MORE MATERIAL IN THIS MAGAZINE THAN YOU GET IN ANY SIMILAR PUBLICATION ON THE NEWSSTANDS

Rob and the Reporters

— Or, —

Hustling for War News by Wireless

By GASTON GARNE

(A Serial Story.)

CHAPTER XI.

Captured By Reporters.

Rob, whose own wound was rapidly healing, went with Walter and saw him comfortably installed.

"Now then, Rob, don't you think you've got to tie to me," he said, when it came to the parting. "If you get a chance to push on to the front just bust right ahead—see? The case is too important. We shall have to each look out for himself."

It was a relief to Rob to hear him say it, for he felt it his duty to use every means to obtain war news for the Earth.

His chance came that very afternoon, when Mons. Berge introduced him to a young Belgian officer, one Captain Champlain, who was starting by auto for the British front, then near Mons in Western Belgium.

"I can take you along and shall be glad of your company," declared the captain. "Of course we are liable to be captured by some straggling party of Germans, but as I know every inch of the country you run less risk with me than you would with another."

Rob gratefully accepted. He now took leave of Louise, who had already paid him as agreed, the money having been shared with Walter.

She informed Rob that the money in the chest amounted to over $50,000.

There was no time to call again at the hospital, as Captain Champlain was starting at once, it being his intention to run on through the night. He hoped to reach General Taylor's headquarters shortly after sunrise.

Rob found the captain, who spoke perfect English, a very clever fellow and excellent company.

He had been in the engagement at Liege and gave Rob many particulars which he jotted down in shorthand for future use in a detailed story of the siege which he proposed to write as soon as opportunity offered to send it to New York.

Everything went well until after they left Ghent, which was shortly after midnight, when while passing through a forest, the car suddenly went out of business.

Captain Champlain was acting as his own chauffeur, and upon making a hasty examination he informed Rob that the break was serious.

"There is no help for it," he said. "She'll have to be towed to a garage. I'm afraid this is going to put us back a day."

"Where is the nearest garage?" asked Rob.

"Donay, five miles ahead," was the reply. "There are no chances to telephone, so there's nothing for it but for me to walk there. Will you stay here and look out for the car."

"Surely. I want to be of what service I can," Rob assured him, so having lit a cigar the captain started away.

It was lonely business.

The road was an unfrequented one, purposely so chosen. No one passed during the first hour. Rob had all he could do to keep awake.

At last he did drop off, to be suddenly awakened by hearing a car whizzing up behind him in which, as it came alongside, he saw certainly four young men who looked to be English.

It stopped and the man at the wheel called out to know if Rob had broken down.

"As you see," he replied.

"Want any help?" the man asked.

"You can't help me," replied Rob, explaining the cause of the trouble and that the owner of the car had gone to a garage at Donay.

"I'd offer you a tow, only we don't happen to be going that way," said the man, adding:

"Say, you're English, aren't you?"

"Canadian," replied Rob. "I'm from Newfoundland."

"So? What brought you to Belgium?"

"Oh, I'm here on business."

"Of course it's none of mine, but, say you don't happen to understand wireless telegraphy, do you?"

"As it happens, I do. That's my trade," replied Rob.

The man's manner was cordial. He saw no reason why he should not speak the truth.

Instantly he regretted it.

The man whispered something to the one seated beside him, who sprang out of the car, and approaching the other auto, said:

"You fellow, come with us and we will pay you well."

"Couldn't think of it," replied Rob. "What do you want me for?"

"No matter, you'll have to go, that's all there is to it."

"But I won't go," replied Rob decidedly. "I've got my own business to attend to. Besides, I can't leave this car."

"Now look here," said the man, suddenly drawing a revolver, "you get out of that car and come with us or I propose to shoot you—see?"

"So say we all!" cried the others, and Rob found himself facing not only one revolver, but four.

"Do you really mean it?" he gasped.

"You have said it," replied the spokesman. "You've gotter come, young feller, and that's all there is to it."

"But would you murder me?"

"Sure. We're on the hustle. We shall let nothing stand in our way."

There seemed to be no help for it. Reluctantly Rob descended and crowded into the other car, feeling that these were probably just plain crooks and that he was going to be robbed.

Nothing of the sort happened.

The car was driven ahead at great speed.

"What's your name?" asked one of those next to Rob.

(To be continued.)

GOOD READING

GREATEST MOUTH-ORGAN

The world's largest harmonica is 48 inches long and is played by two midgets, Caroline Parckerd, 32 inches tall, and Francis Parckerd, 40 inches tall.

THE HAIRNET INDUSTRY

The future commercial prosperity of Chefoo, China, a city of 100,000 population can be determined only when it is known whether American women will continue to bob their hair or return to flowing and errant tresses. Chefoo's chief industry is making hair nets and they sell $5,000,000 worth to this country each year, in addition to exporting $3,060,000 worth to France and other countries. In China the price for the nets runs from $1 to $2 a gross and for making them factory workers are paid 7 cents a day.

HUDSON TUNNELS FINISHED BY 1925

Work on the $29,000,000 vehicular tunnels under the Hudson River, between Jersey City and Manhattan, is progressing so rapidly that it is expected the tunnels will be ready for use by 1925. Thus, much of the present heavy traffic on Hudson River ferryboats will be alleviated. Work was begun in October, 1920.

Two tunnels are being dug; the north, for Jersey-bound traffic and the south for New York-bound traffic. The entrance on the New York end will be at Broome street between Hudson and Varick streets, Manhattan. The exit will be at Canal and Varick streets. In New Jersey, the entrance will be at Twelfth and Provost streets and the exit at Fourteenth and Provost streets, Jersey City.

It was said that the new tunnels when completed will be of great benefit to Brooklyn because of the easy access to both the Williamsburg and Manhattan Bridges. In this manner, it is thought that trade between Brooklyn and Jersey manufacturers will be promoted.

The tunnels will be 9250 feet long, twenty-nine feet and six inches in diameter with a twenty-foot roadway for two lines of traffic in both directions. The tunnels will be ninety-three feet beneath high water. The exterior surface of the tunnels will be constructed of castiron which will not rust. Inside the castiron surface will be a wall of concrete nineteen inches thick. The interior of the tunnels will be tiled. Electric lights and a special ventilating system will be installed.

GOLDFISH NOW LISTED AS AUTOMOBILE VICTIMS

Naturalists recently ascribed the extinction of the Central Park squirrels in part to the automobile. Recently a still more heinous charge is laid at the door, as it were, of the motor vehicle. It is said by the authorities of the New York Aquarium that the motor car is exterminating the goldfish of this city and vicinity.

The supply source from which the goldfish tanks at the Aquarium are replenished is failing. Where once a week's collecting in nearby waters would net hundreds of the fish, an ordinary week this year will yield only eight or ten specimens.

"For years," said Miss Ida M. Mellen, Secretary of the Aquarium, "we have gathered fresh fish from the waters of Manhattan. That means largely lakes and streams in the public parks. There have always been plenty of goldfish until now, in many varieties. We will get other fish from the local parks, but we have discovered a great scarcity of goldfish. They seem to be dying out. The reason for that is the large number of automobiles that pass by the ponds where we collect. The oil that they drop on the roads washes into the little lakes, pollutes the water and kills much of the fish life. The goldfish in particular have been unable to withstand it."

Experts shake their heads and sigh, but to no avail. They can look through the glass house of the goldfish and tell if the inmates are marked for death, but they have not been able to check the onslaught of the destroyer. According to Miss Mellen, goldfish life in many parts of the country is threatened by an epidemic of black fungus, a parasitic growth that fastens itself upon the tiny body and saps its vitality. To the goldfish this disease is as dread as the foot-and-mouth disease to cattle, and as deadly.

The infection wipes out whole schools of the little creatures. Often the dealer who hatches them and the fan who purchases them are deceived by the appearance of the specimens. They fail to detect symptoms in advance. The sale is made all unwittingly; then the fish drop off one by one, or even two by two, until the entire tank is depopulated.

"Mystery Magazine"

Semi-Monthly

15 Cents a Copy

- 154 THE HOUSE ON THE ROCKS, by Jack Bechdolt.
- 155 LAUGHING DEATH'S TRAIL, by Nels LeRoy Jorgensen.
- 156 THE MEDICINE DROPPER, by G. P. Wilson.
- 157 A QUESTION OF KICK, by Eugene Jones.
- 158 THE MYSTERY OF ROARING WATERS, by Harry Adler.
- 159 THE RIVER PIRATES, by Hamilton Craigie.
- 160 THE SHADOW OF A NOOSE, by Jack Bechdolt.
- 161 AT 2 A. M., by Beulah Poynter.

THE INTRIGUERS

By GROVER KIDWELL

Out Today in No. 162

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street

New York City

"Moving Picture Stories"

A Weekly Magazine Devoted to Photoplays and Players

PRICE TEN CENTS PER COPY

Each number contains Three Stories of the Best Films on the Screen—Elegant Half-tone Scenes from the Plays—Interesting Articles About Prominent People in the Films—Doings of Actors and Actresses in the Studio and Lessons in Scenario Writing.

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street

New York City

INTERESTING RADIO NEWS AND HINTS

OIL IN CONDENSERS

Never use oil on the bearings of a variable condenser which depends on friction for the connection to the rotary plates. If the shaft does not turn easily there is something wrong with it. The oil is likely to do more harm than good, as it is an excellent insulator and may spoil the electrical connection at the shaft.

VENTILATE YOUR BATTERY

If the storage A battery is kept in a wooden cabinet to hide it, be sure that some sort of ventilation is provided. The acid fumes are very powerful, and have been known to eat metal hinges and furnishings.

CLEAN CRYSTALS

If you have a crystal detector, keep your fingers off the mineral. Handling it leaves a greasy surface and it is more apt to collect dust. It is best to keep your crystal covered and if you must handle it, do so with a pair of tweezers.

LEARN TUNING FIRST

To obtain the most out of a newly purchased set it is necessary to learn a few rudimentary principles of operation. What to do and what not to do should be memorized. The dealer will give you instructions.

WATER FOR BATTERY

Nothing but pure, distilled water should ever be poured into a storage battery. Never add acid. If the battery does not charge properly bring it to a service station and have it examined.

Keep dry batteries in a cool place, or at least in a shaded one, during the hot Summer months.

SHIELDING PANELS

In the shielding of the panel in your new radio set remember that it is only necessary to place the shield back of the parts of the panel that house the tuning units, such as the variometers, variocoupler, or variable condensers. The detector and amplifier units do not need to be shielded.

TO RECHARGE DRY CELLS

When your dry cells go dead bore two holes in the top of the cell, on opposite sides of the center connection each a quarter of an inch in diameter and three inches deep. Fill these holes with cider vinegar or a 20 per cent. solution of sulphuric acid and water, then plug up the holes with paraffin wax to prevent evaporation. A dry cell may be charged several times in this manner.

TO MAKE RECEIVERS MORE SENSITIVE

The efficiency of transmitting sets is relatively higher than that of the receiving sets because the former use heavy conductors and perfect insulation in the high frequency circuits. The only reason for using small wire for receiving circuits is in the interest of economy and space and cost.

If receivers were wired with heavier leads, and if the coils were wound with copper ribbon or heavy wire instead of magnet wire, the appearance might suffer somewhat, but the efficiency would be greatly increased. Further improvement can be made by increasing the diameter of the coils.

HEROIC RADIO OPERATORS

The United States Shipping Board has called the Bureau of Navigation's attention to the unusual services performed by radio operators Howard A. Moyer, Charles R. Stewart, and Alexander D. MacAlpin, aboard the "President Monroe" when the vessel encountered heavy weather in the North Atlantic during January. These operators jeopardized their lives in assisting in erecting the ship's antenna, which had washed overboard, notwithstanding the fact that the officers of the ship refused to allow the members of the deck force to assist the operators in hazardous work. Their faithfulness to their duty, however, inspired them to erect the needed antennae and thereby maintain the radio installation in operating condition for an emergency.

NEW RADIO CLIP

A novel clip designed to give high electrical conductivity is the invention of Eugene Pons of Schenectady, N. Y. It is a double-grip clip for use in radio or battery work, and has two continuous electrical paths unbroken by hinge joints or picot pins. The current therefore does not pass through and take the temper from the spring. An absolutely tight connection is possible in five seconds with the Pons clip, it being only necessary to press one end, attach, and press the opposite end. In other words, the Pons clip is a double-headed proposition, with gripping teeth at both ends. This makes it applicable in many different ways.

MEASURE B BATTERY

The only way to determine the condition of a B battery is to use a voltmeter. An ammeter must never be applied to the terminals. It will form a short circuit that will quickly rob the cells of their strength.

Most B batteries are put up in blocks of fifteen cells, and deliver 22½ volts when new. This voltage, however, will decrease slowly as the batteries are used. Even unused ones are bound to drop off in time, due to the deterioration caused by the strong chemical action of the cell components.

A fifteen-cell block should read no less than 21 volts when purchased, and will give satisfactory service until the figure drops to about 16 or 17. Even after then, some batteries are still good for weeks of use. The limiting factor will be the amount of noise generated by the dying cells.

WIRING THE SET

In wiring a radio set with bus bar, most people cut one piece of wire at a time and solder it in place immediately. This method of working is a very slow one, as the soldering iron is idle during the intervals when the next length of wire is being measured out.

It is much better to cut all the wires first and then to solder them in position. It is surprising how quickly this can be done. The individual wires should be laid out on the table so that one will not be confused with another.

Carefully tin all the metal surfaces to which the ends of the bus bars are to be fastened. This work takes only a minute and saves trouble in the actual soldering.

By following this line of action, the writer once completely wired in a half hour a two-stage amplifier with jacks, starting off with the uncut lengths of bus bar. The cutting of the latter took about twenty minutes and the soldering the remaining ten. Needless to say, a good hot iron was used which retained enough heat to allow completion of four or five joints at a time.

LOUD SPEAKERS

In its present usage, the term loud speaker is applied generally to devices employing some means of distributing sounds over an area. It is possible to divide loud speakers into three separate and distinct classes, however:

1. Those which make use of existing telephone receivers by means of rubber connections or clamps to attach a pair of phones to a horn.

2. The type of speaker that uses a single telephone receiver equipped with a cap to permit its being fastened to the small opening of a horn. In this class can be included the numerous loud speakers that incorporate a telephone of some sort in the base of the horn.

3. The loud speaker constructed on the solenoid principle, in which the currents act on a coil placed in the field of a strongly energized magnet.

A serious limitation to the first and second class of loud speakers is that when high B battery voltage, such as are common in most audio frequency amplifiers, are used, a DC current flows through the windings of the phone and exerts a strong downward pull on the diaphragm. This causes the metal diaphragm to be drawn out of shape and will cause the loud speaker to have a hollow or tinny sound.

This vibration of the metal diaphragm toward and away from the poles of the magnet in the unit will cause the air gap to vary. This in turn will cause the impedance (alternating current resistance) of the loud speaker to vary and has a great deal to do with the proper operation of the receiver set itself on weak or distant singles. The impedance of the loud speaker has its function in the tuning and balancing of the receiver, and if it is fluctuating will have its effect in upsetting the accurate tuning of a receiver.

In the third type of loud speaker the air gap is constant and fluctuation of current through the windings of the loud speaker does not change the impedance of the circuit.

At the same time the third type of reproducer will not rattle or "freeze" on extremely loud signals, yet will give a greater amount of sound on extremely weak or faint signals. A mica diaphragm, one of the most perfect substances known for sound reproduction, is used.

The material of which the horn is composed is very important as regards the quality of music that will be received, and with the faithfulness with which the sounds are reproduced. In general a horn made of wood or papier-mache gives a purer tone than a metal one, which is liable to produce brassy overtones or vibrations.

THE VARIABLE CONDENSER

In most radio receiving sets a 23-plate condenser (.0005 mfd.) is used to tune the secondary inductance, but many times the builder of the set finds that he has no instrument of this particular capacity on hand. Instead he will substitute a 43-plate condenser (.001 mfd.), and expect to get the same results.

Now suppose you have the plates of your condenser turned all the way out. By this is meant that the rotary plates are just as far from the stationary plates as it is possible to get them. As these plates are brought into mesh, the capacity of the condenser increases and in most cases the wave length goes up.

Suppose you had a 23-plate condenser in action. You will find that it is possible to receive WJZ at 40 and WEAFF at about 55 on the dial. These numbers do not necessarily correspond with your particular set, but are just given as examples.

Between these numbers, you have a total blank, or if your set is particularly good, you may be able to pick up a station or so in between WJZ and WEAFF. The stations are separated on the dial. Now suppose we put in a larger condenser, say a .001, or 43 plater. The stations will come in as before, but you will find that they are much closer together on the dial. This is because the capacity changes so much faster, with the result that the wavelength range also changes more quickly.

You will find that down on the lower wave lengths, where the stations are close together, it will be next to impossible to separate them, for the simple reason that the least change in the condenser setting will make considerable change in the wave length. In short, your set will tune too sharply and will not be as selective as before. If the set happens to be one that tunes broadly, you will find that the interference from one station to another is increased even more with this large size condenser.

It will also be apparent that the whole upper end of the scale is practically useless, for the simple reason that the condenser is too large and the upper end will give stations far above the band of broadcasters.

In mounting the dial on any condenser, it is always a good plan to turn the plates all the way into mesh and then place the dial on the shaft in such a way that the 100 mark is at the top, or opposite the mark on the panel where you will take readings. This as the plates are turned out, the readings will get less and less, as the wave length is reduced and you will find the set much easier to calibrate.

By bearing both of these suggestions in mind you will possibly save a lot of trouble with your next set.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, AUGUST 8, 1924

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies.....	Postage Free	8 Cents
One Copy Three Months.....	"	$1.00
One Copy Six Months.....	"	2.00
One Copy One Year.....	"	4.00
Canada, $4.50; Foreign, $5.00.

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order, Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly.

HARRY E. WOLFF, } Harry E. Wolff, Pres.
 Publisher, Inc., } Charles E. Nylander, Sec.
 166 W. 23d St., N. Y. } L. F. Wilzin, Treas.

ITEMS OF INTEREST

REAL SEA SERPENT

Some of the crew of a Scottish fishing boat thought they had caught a sea serpent when they hauled aboard an eel which weighed 88 pounds and measured 7 feet in length and 26 inches in girth. It was caught in the North Sea about 20 miles from land.

STRANGE TREE FATALITY

Ored Malinax, twenty-one years old, rancher, was killed recently at Libby, Mont., by an unusual accident. He felled a tree, which struck a second tree, which fell and hit a third. The third took down a fourth, which fell on the man, killing him. The trees stood in a circle.

EELS TRAVEL THREE YEARS

After seventeen years of study and research it has been discovered that the fresh water eel breeds in salt water near the West Indies, many of them traveling thousands of miles to reach the breeding places. A period of three years elapses between the time of the birth and the reappearance of the eels in their home waters.

MAN-EATING SHARK CAUGHT

A man-eating shark, nine feet four inches long and weighing more than 200 pounds, was landed the other day at Bayside Dock, Sheepshead Bay. The fish, the first of the man-eating variety caught in local waters this season, was captured by Captain Joseph Ecock.

Ecock was fishing for porgies on Scallop Ledge when the shark took several fish off his lines. Ecock threw out his baited shark hook, attached by a steel chain to a buoy. The shark took it and started out to sea, towing the metal float. Ecock chased it for two miles in his smack. The shark, exhausted, finally came to the surface near the boat and was killed by an ax.

Ecock caught two such sharks off the Sandy Hook light ship last year.

MILLIONS IN GOLD—WHAT BECOMES OF IT?

What becomes of gold? It has many channels of disappearance, according to experts. Figures show that more than half of the annual output is employed in the fine arts and jewelry trade. Thousands of pounds also are used by dentists, according to Popular Mechanics, one estimate being that over a ton is needed every year for the filling of teeth. Then money is worn away in handling, this loss being placed at $1,250,000 annually. Bank of England sovereigns are often tested and found to have lost much of the original weight. Of the immense quantities of the precious metal that have been buried away in the earth, it is believed comparatively little has ever been recovered. The priests of Peru are said to have buried approximately $10,000,000 worth of treasure to preserve it from the clutches of their persecutors. None of this has been found. The tombs of the old Kings of Egypt were treasure houses, immense quantities of gold and jewels being interred with them. It has been estimated by historians that Alexander the Great became the master of great hoards of gold, all of which, so far as is known, has vanished.

LAUGHS

"How can I ever keep this house quiet?" "Shut it up."

"Say, why did you give that beggar your watch?" "Oh, just to pass the time away."

Jack (quoting Hamlet)—If thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool. Ethel—Oh, Jack, this is so sudden.

A carpenter is an unreasonable fellow. He objects to plain board, and yet he don't like a board until it is planed.

"I wish I was twins," said Willie. "Why?" "I'd send the other half of me to school and this half would go fishing."

Little Dot—Oh, dear! I wish I wasn't a girl. Teacher—You do? Why? Little Dot—'Cause I like to sit with the boys.

Bjones—Don't you think a talkative woman is more popular with the men than any other kind? Henpecke—What other kind is there?

Once a bright little lad was asked to tell his age. "Well," he said, "I am not quite as young as my teeth, and just about as old as my nose."

"I call 'em the cutlery family." "Why so?" "Well, the daughter spoons, the father forks out the money and the mother knifes the other guests."

Little Bessie—How will I know when I'm naughty? Mother—Your conscience will tell you, dear. Little Bessie—I don't care about what it tells me—will it tell you?

BRIEF BUT POINTED

GUNS AS WINDOW PROPS

Revolvers which once served to hold up men are now being used in Wichita, Kan., to hold up windows. The city commission voted to destroy more than 200 revolvers captured from underworld characters by the police. A foundry was given the weapons on condition they would melt them. They were moulded into window sash weights.

POWER OF EAGLE'S GRIP

The Swatt Brothers of West Boothbay, Me., while in a boat, picked up a white-headed eagle that had been shot through one of its wings, leaving it helpless in the water. They put the bird in the dory and he gripped the wood so tightly that they had to pry its talons open to make the transfer from one boat to another. They called a veterinary surgeon in an attempt to save the bird's life.

SARDINIA'S NEW LAKE

The Island of Sardinia was recently visited by the King of Italy, who went to attend the inauguration of an enormous reservoir which it is hoped will prevent the island from suffering in the future from lack of water. The reservoir, which is considered one of the greatest public utility works attempted in Italy in modern times, collects the waters of the River Tirso at the time of the year when the flow is plentiful, and is expected to provide the entire island with water throughout the summer months. The Tirso reservoir is the largest artificial lake in Europe. One hundred and sixty thousand workmen have been employed in its construction at a cost of 90,000,000 lire, half of which was provided by the State and half by private capitalists.

CHEWING-GUM MOSAICS

"New York's chewing-gum mosaics are to be observed throughout the city," remarked a visitor from abroad. "When I was here a few years ago I was puzzled by the curious design on many of your sidewalks and the floors of your public buildings. At frequent intervals I discovered dark blotches scattered without any apparent plan. They showed up best on the stone surfaces, especially on the porous material you use in New York on ramps and staircases. On looking into the matter, I found that the marks were made by pieces of chewing gum.

"The dark spots are all about the same size. This is due to the fact that the portions of chewing gum masticated are generally uniform. When the gum is dropped on the floor or pavement it sticks tightly and is quickly hammered down by thousands of passing feet. It is ground into the porous surface and becomes a part of it. In time it is worn away or scraped off, but the dark stain remains. These millions of stains are steadily building your chewing-gum mosaic."

COLORING ORANGES WITH OIL FUMES

An orange may be inwardly ripe when outwardly green and if allowed to yellow on the trees the marketing may be delayed four to six weeks and consequently a less favorable price may be obtained.

This green condition gives the Satsuma orange grower more concern than others. Satsumas are raised in upper Florida, lower Alabama and lower Mississippi. Normally they are gathered about October 15th, but they can be harvested earlier when artificial processes of coloring are used to get away from the persistent greenness of skin.

The United States Department of Agriculture has worked out a process for coloring oranges without harming the fruit. The process consists of enclosing the oranges in tight rooms and subjecting them to fumes of kerosene stoves or to gasoline engine exhaust. The fumes given off destroy the green chlorophyll so that the yellow of the orange shows up. It requires about four days to bring out the yellow of the oranges by this process. This is better than waiting four to six weeks for the fruit to ripen on the trees, running the risk of frost or storm damage and facing the probability of a lower market when the oranges are ultimately harvested.

WINDWARD ISLANDS CHARMING LANDS

The Windward Islands colony, to which London is sending a new Governor and commander-in-chief, is one of the least known to Americans of British territories in the new world.

Windward Islands means different things on different maps, and to add to the confusion several other quite distant names are applied to the whole and to parts of the islands that sweep in a great arc from Porto Rico to the top of South America, says a bulletin of the National Geographic Society.

The Windward Islands are well in the tropics, being in the latitude of Nicaragua, the Philippines and Southern India, and they are as charming examples of tropical isles as can be found in any ocean. All are mountainous, and over the sharp peaks deep valleys and more gentle slopes of all is thrown an intensely green mantle of tropical trees, shrubs and grasses. All were peopled by the warlike Carib Indians when Columbus and other Spanish navigators discovered them. But these were largely killed off or transported during the next few centuries by British and French settlers.

Most of the inhabitants of the islands to-day are black and are traceable to the slave ships that brought over their African cargoes during the early Colonial development. On St. Vincent, which was long left to the natives, several slave ships were wrecked, and the survivors mingled with the Caribs, so that on that island there is a more pronounced Indian strain than elsewhere.

On each of the islands is a small minority of white officials, land owners and business men. Each of the three larger islands has its own local government machinery under a British administrator, and over all is the Governor who resides in St. George's, chief city of Grenada. The governments are "Crown Colonies," the officials being appointed from London.

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

ITEMS OF INTEREST

CLOCK MADE OF COAL

A novel clock, the case of which is made of hard coal, is owned by M. A. Randall of Concord, N. H. It was given him by his son, Elmer S. Randall, who resides in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Mr. Randall also has stickpins and cuff buttons and Mrs. Randall bar-pins and a necklace set in sulphur diamonds which came from the coal mines of Pennsylvania.

OLD MOVIES IN SHOES

What becomes of the millions of miles of old "movie" films that have served their time in amusing the public? When it is junked it is cleaned by a chemical process which removes the coating. This coating is capable of yielding silver at the rate of 112 ounces to the ton. The cleaned celluloid strips sometimes pass into the manufacture of patent leather. So you may at the present time be wearing on your feet a bit of the film which has once held the laughter-provoking feet of Charlie Chaplin.

BANK ROBBERS MISS $8,000

Six youthful bandits, bent on making a large haul, raided the Prairie State Bank of Oak Park, a suburb of Chicago, shortly before closing time the other day, terrorized eleven persons in the bank and escaped with about $300, overlooking between $7,000 and $8,000 lying on the table of one of the bank officials.

The robbery was accomplished so quickly that the police, called by passers-by who saw the bandits enter the bank, had not arrived when the gang made their escape in an automobile which had been left in the rear of the institution.

The money the bandits found was in a pigeon-hole of a teller's desk. While three stood guard over the people in the bank, their companions make a systematic search of the cages but overlooked the money in plain view on a table.

AMERICAN DIAMONDS

The presence of fresh-water pearls in American streams is a comparatively well-known fact. The discovery of diamonds in the United States has not been so widely advertised, largely, no doubt, because so few jewels of the latter kind have been found here. South Africa is now the largest producer in the world, and Brazil ranks next in present yield. India, Borneo and the Ural Mountains of Russia have in the past supplied a great many diamonds. In nearly every country which supplies these stones they are taken from the mineral in which they were once deposited. South Africa affords a marked exception to the rule. In that part of the world they are embedded in "pans" or "pipes," which are streaks of lava, that have invaded a black shaly rock. The suspicion is now entertained that the intense heat of volcanic action may have converted some of the carbon in the shale into jewels.

One of the regions in the United States from which small diamonds have been obtained is the Piedmont Plateau, at the southeastern base of the Appalachian chain, between Southern Virginia and Georgia. Nearly or quite a dozen, one reaching 23 carats in size, have been picked up there, under circumstances that suggest the probability of having been transported—rolled down hill perhaps—many miles from the place of their birth. Geological conditions like those existing at Kimberley have been observed in Kentucky, but up to date no diamonds have yet been discovered in that State. A possible explanation of the failure is the lower proportion of carbon in the shale.

A somewhat difficult problem is raised by finding seven diamonds, ranging in size from 4 to 21 carats, and a number of smaller ones, in the Great Lake region, under circumstances that indicate they were brought there by the great ice sheet of the glacial period. Most of the stones were discovered in Wisconsin, but Michigan and Ohio have each reported one or two also.

LOOK, BOYS!

TRAPEZEE

The Acrobatic Wonder Toy

ALMOST HUMAN IN ITS ACTIONS!

It consists of a handsome parallel iron frame on which the little yellow man accurately performs like an athlete.

Five Different Stunts —

THE FLYING TRAPEZE — Release the trigger-pin and the figure swings forward, gripping the brass trapeze-bar, turns a somersault in the air and catches a cross-bar by his heels.

THROUGH THE LOOP — A swift swing and he goes through a wire loop, makes a turn and, catching by his heels, swings head downward from a bar.

THE GIANT SWING — He goes forward with a rush, releases the trapeze, catches a horizontal-bar with his heels, makes two swift somersaults in the air and catches by his heels again.

He performs two more horizontal-bar acts with the grace and agility of a circus star, and many new ones can be invented.

The Most Wonderful Toy in the World!

PRICE $1.50

The collapsible stand and the little manikin are neatly packed in a handsome box. Delivered anywhere in the United States on receipt of price. Address

WOLFF NOVELTY CO.,
166 W. 23d St., New York City, N. Y.

FREE Navy Model AIRSHIP AND PARACHUTE

6 Ft. Long

Boys! Here's the great navy model Airship. Large 6 ft. air bag with inflators, parachute with automatic release and complete instructions for flying. Will fly for miles at height of 1,000 feet. Many flights can be made. Great chance to study aerial navigation. Send today for 12 packages of perfumed sachet, sell at 10c each, return money when sold and this wonderful airship is yours. Boys if you want real sport get this airship. Write today.

JONES MFG. CO., Dept. 357 ATTLEBORO, MASSACHUSETTS

TOBACCO

Habit Cured or No Pay

Any form, cigars, cigarettes, pipe, chewing or snuff Guaranteed. Harmless. Complete treatment sent on trial. Costs $1.00 if it cures. Nothing if it fails.

SUPERBA CO. M-21, Baltimore, Md.

For that Jolly Beach Party

Pack your week-end bag, say goodbye to the hot, noisy city and set out for a day or two of real fun and healthy sport at the lake or sea. And don't forget to take along your pocket orchestra so there'll be plenty of good music for those who want to dance. If you want to be the hit of the party, be ready with a Hohner Harmonica—

The World's Best

There's nothing like good music for happiness and there's nothing like a Hohner for good music. Hohner Harmonicas are true in tone, accurate in pitch and perfect in workmanship. Get a Hohner Harmonica today and play it tonight. 50¢ up at all dealers.

Ask for the Free Instruction Book. If your dealer is out of copies, write M. Hohner, Inc., Dept. 156 New York City.

HOHNER HARMONICAS

I MAKE THE BEST CHOCOLATE BARS

Mints and Chewing Gum. Be my agent. Everybody will buy from you. Write today. Free Samples.

MILTON GORDON
134 Jackson St., Cincinnati, Ohio

HANDS UP!

Protect yourself against hold-up, rowdies, etc. with this clever cigarette case of light weight metal. Looks exactly like the real thing! Pull the trigger, back flies the lid showing a full package of your cigarettes. Lots of fun scaring your friends, and a great protector. Sold exclusively by us. PAY POST. MAN $1.79 on delivery plus postage. Money back if not satisfied.

PATHFINDER CO Dept. P10B 534 Sixth Ave., New York

Factory to Rider

Saves $10 to $25 on the Ranger Bicycle you select from 44 Styles, colors and sizes. Delivered free on approval express prepaid for 30 Days' Free Trial. $5 a Month if desired. Possession and use at once on our liberal Monthly payment plan. Bicycles $21.50 and up. Lamps, wheels, equipment at half usual prices. Write for marvelous new prices, wonderful 30 day trial offer and terms.

Mead CYCLE COMPANY Write us today for free catalog
DEPT. A188 CHICAGO

Ma Ma Doll FREE

she Walks-Talks Sleeps-Swings

Yes! she will walk with you and talk; says "Ma Ma" just like a real, live baby. Lay her down and she goes to sleep. Put her in her cute little Swing and she's a happy, laughing Dollie; the dearest, most lovable Doll, with rosy cheeks, big blue eyes, ruby lips--and the sweetest face. She is dressed just right to romp and play and is 15 in. tall.

Doll-Swing-Glasses Given

We send you this handsome Walking, Talking, Sleeping Dollie, with her own little swing and Doll Eyeglasses ALL FREE for selling only 24 packages of Perfumed Sachet -- 10¢ each. Write to-day. Send no money.

JONES MFG. CO. DEPT. 356 ATTLEBORO, MASS

How to Get A Position with the U. S. Government

Thousands of appointments are made yearly. Good salaries—short hours—liberal vacations (as much as 30 days in some branches of the service). Positions open now in Washington and other cities and in Alaska, Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines.

"Pull" and influence unnecessary. Common school education sufficient as groundwork for most positions. The International Correspondence Schools will prepare you right at home to pass your Civil Service examination with a high mark.

Mail the coupon to-day for 48-page Free Civil Service booklet.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 4492-C, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me a copy of your 48-page CIVIL SERVICE BOOKLET, which tells how I can secure a good-paying position with the U. S. Government.

Name.....

Address.....

Electricity Needs You

I WILL TRAIN YOU AT HOME

Stop right here. This is YOUR opportunity! Electricity is calling you, and the Electrical Business is in for a tremendous increase. But it needs more trained men—at big pay. By my Home Study Course in Practical Electricity I can train you for these positions.

Earn $70 to $200 a Week

You've always had a liking for Electricity and a hankering to do electrical jobs. Now is the time to develop that talent; there's big money in it. Even if you don't know anything at all about Electricity you can quickly grasp it by my up-to-date, practical method of teaching. You will find it intensely interesting and highly profitable. I've trained and started hundreds of men in the Electrical Business, men who have made big successes. YOU CAN ALSO

Be a Big Paid ELECTRICAL EXPERT

What are you doing to prepare yourself for a real success? At the rate you are going where will you be in ten years from now? Have you the specialized training that will put you on the road to success? Have you ambition enough to prepare for success, and get it?

You have the ambition and I will give you the training, so get busy. I am offering you success and all that goes with it. Will you take it? I'll make you an ELECTRICAL EXPERT. I will train you as you should be trained. I will give you the benefit of my advice and 20 years of engineering experience and help you in every way to the biggest, possible success.

CHIEF ENGINEER
COOKE

Chicago Engineering Works

Dept. 204 2154 Lawrence Av.
CHICAGO, ILL.

Dear Sir: You may send me entirely free and fully prepaid, a copy of your book, "How to Become an Electrical Expert," and particulars about your Home Study Course in Electricity.

Valuable Book Free

My book, "How to Become an Electrical Expert," has started many a man on the way to fortune. I will send a copy, free and prepaid, to every person answering this advertisement.

Act Now! Good intentions never get you anywhere. It is action, alone, that counts. NOW IS THE TIME TO ACT.

L. L. COOKE, Chief Engineer

CHICAGO ENGINEERING WORKS

2154 LAWRENCE AVENUE
Dept. 204 Chicago, U. S. A.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

FREE!

BIG ELECTRICAL OUTFIT

A fine outfit of Electrical Tools, Instruments, Materials, etc., absolutely FREE to every student. I will also send you FREE and fully prepaid—Proof Lessons to show you how easily you can learn Electricity and enter this splendid profession by my new, revised and original system of Training by Mail.

RADIO COURSE FREE

Special newly-written wireless course worth $45.00 given away FREE. Full particulars when you mail coupon.

Earn Money While Learning

I give you something you can use now. Early in my Home Study Course I show you how to begin making money in Electricity, and help you get started. No need to wait until the whole course is completed. Hundreds of students have made several times the cost of their course in spare time work while learning.

$90 Drafting Course FREE

There is such an urgent demand for practical, trained Draftsmen that I am making this special offer in order to enable deserving, ambitious and bright men to get into this line of work. I will teach you to become a Draftsman and Designer until you are Drawing a salary of $250.00 a month. You need not pay me for my personal instruction or for the complete set of instruments. But you must take advantage of this special offer at once.

$300 a Month Salary— $450 on the Side at Home!

Chief Draftsman Dobe

That's the kind of money my drafting students make. Read what this one says:

"As a beginner I am doing fine. Am earning a salary of $300 per month, besides I made over $450 at home the last two months, drawing plans for private parties. The practical drafting training you gave me by mail put me where I am in less than six month's study. Thank you for all your personal interest and help you gave me so far."

(Signed) J. B.

(Name and address upon request)

I Guarantee

To Train You Until You Are Placed in a Position Paying up to $250 and $300 a Month

Write and I'll tell you how I make you a first-class, big-money-earning draftsman in a very few months! I do this by a method no other man nor institution can imitate. I give you personal training at home by mail until you are actually placed in a position paying up to $250 and $300 a month. Six thousand draftsmen are wanted every month.

Free Book

Send Coupon Today

No matter what plans you have for the future. Get this great book—"Successful Draftsmanship." Find out about the simply marvelous opportunities ahead now. How the world needs draftsmen, engineers, architects and builders. What great salaries and possibilities there are! Send coupon for free book today.

Chief Draftsman, Engineers Equipment Co.
1951 Lawrence Ave. Div. B-109 Chicago, Ill.

This Outfit FREE

And more—I give you a whole set of drafting tools the minute you become my student. You get every tool you need. A magnificent set of instruments which will build your success in draftsmanship.

Chief Draftsman, Engineers Equipment Co.
1951 Lawrence Ave. Div. B-109 Chicago, Ill.

Without any obligation whatsoever, please mail your book, "Successful Draftsmanship", and full particulars of your liberal "Personal Instruction" offer to few students.

Name Age

Address

Post Office State

FAME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

— LATEST ISSUES —

- 942 Capturing the Money; or, How Ben Balley Made His Mark.
- 943 Digging for Gold; or, The Luck of a Boy Miner.
- 944 A Boy with Grit; or, Earning an Honest Living.
- 945 Andy the Mill Boy; or, Rising to the Top.
- 946 Fame Before the Footlights; or, The Boy Who Bossed the Theatre.
- 947 Lucky Lee the Office Boy; or, The Nerviest Lad in New York
- 948 Sure to Get Rich; or, A Smart Young Messenger.
- 949 Pushing It Through; or, The Fate of a Lucky Day.
- 950 A Born Speculator; or, The Young Sphinx of Wall Street.
- 951 The Way to Success; or, The Boy Who Got There.
- 952 Struck Oil; or, The Boy Who Made a Million.
- 953 A Golden Risk; or, The Young Miners of Della Cruz.
- 954 A Sure Winner; or, The Boy Who Went Out With a Circus.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 7c. per copy, in money or postage stamps.

THE FOLLOWING NUMBERS PRICE 8 CENTS

- 955 Golden Fleece; or, The Boy Brokers of Wall Street.
- 956 A Mad Cap Scheme; or, The Boy Treasure Hunters of Cocos Island.
- 957 Adrift On the World; or, Working His Way to Fortune.
- 958 Playing to Win; or, The Foxiest Boy in Wall Street
- 959 Tatters; or, a Boy From the Slums.
- 960 A Young Monte Cristo; or, The Richest Boy in the World.
- 961 Won by Pluck; or, The Boys Who Ran a Railroad.
- 962 "Beating the Brokers; or, The Boy Who Couldn't Be Done.
- 963 A Rolling Stone; or, The Brightest Boy on Record.
- 964 Never Say Die; or, The Young Surveyor of Happy Valley.
- 965 Boss of the Market; or, The Greatest Boy in Wall Street.
- 966 The Chance of His Life; or, The Young Pilot of Crystal Lake.
- 967 Striving for Fortune; or, From Bell-Boy to Millionaire.
- 968 Out for Business; or, The Smartest Boy in Town.
- 969 A Favorite of Fortune; or, Striking It Rich in Wall Street.
- 970 Through Thick and Thin; or, The Adventures of a Smart Boy.
- 971 Doing His Level Best; or, Working His Way Up.
- 972 Always on Deck; or, The Boy Who Made His Mark.
- 973 A Mint of Money; or, The Young Wall Street Broker.
- 974 The Ladder of Fame; or, From Office Boy to Senator.
- 975 On the Square; or, The Success of an Honest Boy.
- 976 After a Fortune; or, The Pluckiest Boy in the West.
- 977 Winning the dollars; or, The Young Wonder of Wall Street.
- 978 Making His Mark; or, The Boy Who Became President.
- 979 Heir to a Million; or, The Boy Who Was Born Lucky.
- 980 Lost in the Andes; or, The Treasures of the Buried City.
- 981 On His Mettle; or, A Plucky Boy in Wall Street.
- 982 A Lucky Chance; or, Taking Fortune on the Wing.
- 983 The Road to Success; or, The Career of a Fortunate Boy.

HARRY K. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.,

166 West 23d Street

New York City

SCENARIOS

HOW TO WRITE THEM

Price 35 Cents Per Copy

This book contains all the most recent changes in the method of construction and submission of scenarios. Sixty Lessons, covering every phase of scenario writing. For sale by all Newsdealers and Bookstores. If you cannot procure a copy, send us the price, 35 cents, in money or postage stamps, and we will mail you one, postage free. Address.

L. Senarens, 210 Seventh Ave., New York, N. Y.

OUR TEN-CENT HAND BOOKS

Useful, Instructive, and Amusing. They contain Valuable Information on Almost Every Subject.

No. 57. HOW TO MAKE MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Full directions how to make a Banjo, Violin, Zither, Aeolian Harp, Xylophone and other musical instruments; together with a brief description of nearly every musical instrument used in ancient or modern times. Profusely illustrated. By Algernon S. Fitzgerald, for twenty years bandmaster of the Royal Bengal Marines.

No. 58. HOW TO BECOME A DETECTIVE.—By Old King Brady, the world-known detective. In which he lays down some valuable and sensible rules for beginners, and also relates some adventures and experiences of well-known detectives.

No. 60. HOW TO BECOME A PHOTOGRAPHER.—Containing useful information regarding the Camera and how to work it; also how to make Photographic Magic Lantern Slides and other Transparencies. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 64. HOW TO MAKE ELECTRICAL MACHINES.—Containing full directions for making electrical machines, inductions coils, dynamos, and many novel toys to be worked by electricity. By R. A. R. Bennett. Fully illustrated.

No. 65. MULDOON'S JOKES.—The most original joke book ever published, and it is brimful of wit and humor. It contains a large collection of songs, jokes, conundrums, etc., of Terrence Muldoon, the great wit, humorist, and practical joker of the day.

No. 67. HOW TO DO ELECTRICAL TRICKS.—Containing a large collection of instructive and highly amusing electrical tricks, together with illustrations. By A. Anderson.

No. 68. HOW TO DO CHEMICAL TRICKS.—Containing over one hundred highly amusing and instructive tricks with chemicals. By A. Anderson. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 69. HOW TO DO SLEIGHT-OF-HAND.—Containing over fifty of the latest and best tricks used by magicians. Also containing the secret of second sight. Fully illustrated.

No. 72. HOW TO DO SIXTY TRICKS WITH CARDS.—Embracing all of the latest and most deceptive card tricks, with illustrations.

No. 73. HOW TO DO TRICKS WITH NUMBERS.—Showing many curious tricks with figures and the magic of numbers. By A. Anderson. Fully illustrated.

No. 74. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS CORRECTLY.—Containing full instructions for writing letters on almost any subject; also rules for punctuation and composition, with specimen letters.

No. 76. HOW TO TELL FORTUNES BY THE HAND.—Containing rules for telling fortunes by the aid of lines of the hand, or the secret of palmistry. Also the secret of telling future events by aid of moles, marks, scars, etc. Illustrated.

No. 77. HOW TO DO FORTY TRICKS WITH CARDS.—Containing deceptive Card Tricks as performed by leading conjurers and magicians. Arranged for home amusement. Fully illustrated.

No. 79. HOW TO BECOME AN ACTOR.—Containing complete instructions how to make up for various characters on the stage; together with the duties of the Stage Manager, Prompter, Scenic Artist and Property Man.

No. 80. GUS WILLIAMS' JOKE BOOK.—Containing the latest jokes, anecdotes and funny stories of this world-renowned German comedian. Sixty-four pages; handsome colored cover containing a half-tone photo of the author.

No. 82. HOW TO DO PALMISTRY.—Containing the most approved methods of reading the lines on the hand, together with a full explanation of their meaning. Also explaining phrenology, and the key for telling character by the bumps on the head. By Leo Hugo Koch. A. C. S. Fully illustrated.

No. 84. HOW TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.—Containing information regarding choice of subjects, the use of words and the manner of preparing and submitting manuscript. Also containing valuable information as to the neatness, legibility and general composition of manuscript.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10c. per copy, in money or stamps, by

HARRY E. WOLFF, Publisher, Inc.

166 West 23d Street

New York City

